Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by the Barnhart Aircraft, Incorporated, against G. W. Preston and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Reversed and remanded.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal herewith adopted, see 290 P. 545.

Leslie H. Kranz and Wellburn Maycock, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Dryer, Castle, McConlogue & Richards, C. H. Hartke, Bruce Wallace, and H. L. Pratt, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

In making an order of transfer to this court, we were satisfied that the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, properly reversed the judgment entered for the plaintiff, but we were unable to agree with all of the reasons advanced by that court in support of its conclusion. The following portion of the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Pullen, pro tempore, meets with our approval, and is therefore adopted as and for the decision of this court:

This is an action on a contract, one count being for the breach thereof and the other for goods sold and delivered and for the reasonable value of a certain brick-making machine.

Appellants were engaged in the manufacture and sale of pressed brick and entered into an agreement with Barnhart Aircraft, Inc., respondent herein, who agreed to design and construct an automatic brick-making machine capable of producing 25,000 bricks conforming to certain designated specifications in ten or less successive hours. Respondent agreed to deliver the completed machine not later than one year from the date of the agreement; and when it was demonstrated that the machine would make the number, kind, and character of brick in the prescribed time, then appellants were to pay to respondent the amount agreed upon.

Respondent designed and undertook the construction of the machine and set it up for demonstration purposes at the brickyard of appellants. Several demonstration runs were made, but never did the machine perform as required by the contract. It never operated continuously for any extended period and the bricks turned out were not of the size or shape mentioned in the specifications. Respondent claims failure of the machine to perform was due to the fact the concrete mixer and conveyer as furnished by the appellants were inadequate to supply to the machine the mixture in sufficient quantity or of required composition. Respondent sets forth in its complaint that it was understood and agreed between the parties that appellants were to furnish, provide, and install in connection with said brick-making machine a concrete mixer in all respects adequate to provide and capable of providing sufficient concrete in the proper form and mixture to permit said machine to operate in the making of brick continuously and to produce 25,000 brick in ten or less successive hours. It therefore was essential to the cause of action of respondent to prove this material allegation. This purported understanding or agreement was based upon paragraph (t) of the contract, which read as follows: "Second party [respondent herein] will furnish all necessary machinery, motors and attachments for operation of said machine, save concrete mixer, power line or lines and steam curing rooms." In interpreting paragraph (t), quoted above, the trial court permitted parol evidence to be introduced for the purpose of explaining what was termed an extrinsic ambiguity.

The first point to be determined, therefore, is whether such an ambiguity is found in the language of paragraph (t) and whether or not the trial court erred in receiving parol evidence in respect to the construction of the paragraph to which we have referred. The trial court, believing paragraph (t) contained such an extrinsic ambiguity, permitted parol evidence to be admitted. This was done under the provisions of sections 1856 and 1860 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows:

"When the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties it is to be considered as containing all those terms, and therefore there can be between the parties and their representatives, or successors in interest, no evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing, except in the following cases:

"1. Where a mistake or imperfection of the writing is put in issue by the pleadings;

"2. Where the validity of the agreement is the fact in dispute.

"But this section does not exclude other evidence of the circumstances under which the agreement was made or to which it relates, as defined in section eighteen hundred and sixty, or to explain an extrinsic ambiguity, or to establish illegality or fraud. The term agreement includes deeds and wills, as well as contracts between parties."

[1] Section 1860 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows:

"For the proper construction of an instrument, the circumstances under which it was made, including the situation of the subject of the instrument and of the parties to it, may also be shown, so that the judge be placed in the position of those whose language he is to interpret."

The rule as stated in section 1860 of the Code of Civil Procedure can only be invoked to explain an ambiguity which appears upon the face of the document itself. United Iron Works v. Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Co., 168 Cal. 81, 141 P. 917, 919; Peterson v. Chaix, 5 Cal. App. 525, 90 P. 948. In United Iron Works v. Outer Harbor, etc., Co., supra, the court said:

"Appellant undertook by parol evidence of the 'surrounding circumstances' to show that there was such a warranty given even if it were not expressly embodied in the written contract. The objections to the admission of this evidence were sustained, and this is the first one of the asserted errors; the contention being that under section 1647 of the Civil Code and section 1860 of the Code of Civil Procedure such evidence was clearly admissible. In this, however, appellant errs. These sections but enact the common-law rule. It is never within their contemplation that a contract reduced to writing and executed by the parties shall have anything added to it or taken away from it by such evidence of 'surrounding circumstance.' This rule of evidence is invoked and employed only in cases where upon the face of the contract itself there is doubt and the evidence is used to dispel that doubt, not by showing that the parties meant something other than what they said, but by showing what they meant by what they said. Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 26 P. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469; Kreuzberger v. Wingfield, 96 Cal. 251, 31 P. 109; Balfour v. Fresno Canal Co., 109 Cal. 221, 41 P. 876; 3 Jones, Commentaries on Evidence, § 454."

Jones, in his Commentaries on Evidence, volume 3, § 454, cited in the foregoing opinion, states the rule as follows:

"The rule has been laid down in the adjudicated cases that no evidence of the language employed by the parties in making the contract can be given in evidence except that which is furnished by the writing itself. It will be found that nearly all if not all the illustrations given in the last section [entitled Proof of Surrounding Facts] recognized the general rule that the written contract must govern and that proof of the acts, situation and statements of the parties can have no other effect than to ascertain the meaning of the parties as expressed in the writing. It will also be found that in the cases where evidence of the declarations of parties has been received the language of the writing admitted of more than one construction, either upon its face or explained by the parol evidence concerning the surrounding facts, or identifying the subject matter or the parties.

"* * * Ambiguity in a written contract, calling for construction, may arise as well from words plain in themselves but uncertain when applied to the subject matter of the contract, as from words which are uncertain in their literal sense and it may be discovered on cross-examination, without precluding its explanation, but it must relate to a subject treated of in the paper and must arise out of words used in treating that subject. Such an ambiguity never arises out of what was not written at all, but only out of what was written so blindly and imperfectly that its meaning is doubtful.

"It must be borne in mind that although declarations of the parties may in some cases be received to explain contracts or words of doubtful meaning, yet no other words can be added to or substituted for those of the writing. The courts are not at liberty to speculate as to the general intention of the parties, but are charged with the duty of ascertaining the meaning of the written language."

[2] The effect of the evidence received by the court in the instant case was to write into the contract a provision not placed there by the parties, although respondent in its complaint attempted by pleading the legal effect of the contract to incorporate therein such an understanding, but when confronted with the document itself the interpolation becomes obvious. The language of paragraph (t) which was agreed upon by the parties to the contract provided that the second party (respondent herein) would furnish all necessary machinery, motors, and attachments for the operation of the machine, save concrete mixer, power line, and steam curing rooms, is not the same agreement as constructed therefrom by the court to the effect that the parties of the first part (appellants herein) agreed to provide a concrete mixer in all respects adequate to provide and capable of providing sufficient concrete in proper form, manner, and mixture to permit or enable said machine to operate in the making of brick continuously and to produce 25,000 brick of given specifications in ten or less successive hours. A study of the contract in question seems to clearly indicate further that respondent was to design and construct a machine capable of performing a definite requirement, but until such machine had been designed, constructed, set up, and had demonstrated its ability to turn out 25,000 brick of specified characteristics in a given time, all within one year from the date of the contract, then and not until then were appellants to be called upon to make any payments or to accept the machine.

[3-6] It is true that appellants designated the point of installation, but that was admittedly done before the machine had proved its worth and could not be construed as an acceptance, although the mixer and conveyor belt of appellants were used to mix and convey the concrete to the machine in question. In determining the construction of the terms of a contract, the acts and interpretation of the parties themselves to the contract have great weight with the courts in construing the intent of the parties, but such acts must be direct, positive, and deliberate, and must show that the acts so done were done in an attempted compliance with the terms of the contract or agreement. Here the record discloses the mixer and conveyor were used not by the direct instruction of the appellants or with the idea of carrying out any of the provisions of the contract, but was a permissive use only. The use of the word "operate," having in mind the entire contract, is significant for if the duty rested upon appellants to co-operate in the experimental stages of the designing and constructing of the machine some word connoting the period of demonstration as distinct from the period of operation would have been used. As a condition precedent to the payment of the purchase price, respondent was required to design and construct a brick-making machine that would comply with the prescribed conditions, and if the lack of a mixer was the agency that prevented performance, the duty rested upon respondent to obtain such a mixer elsewhere and to complete the test. There is nothing so unique in the supplying of concrete to a brick-making machine that would excuse respondent from going into the market if necessary and obtaining such mixer.

[7] Appellants urge that the complaint of respondent did not state a cause of action in that it did not specifically allege that the terms of the contract had been complied with. We are of the opinion that the allegation that "plaintiff did and performed each and every act and thing incumbent upon it to be performed fully and completely in accordance with the terms and provisions of said agreement and addendum, except in so far as such performance has been prevented by the acts and omissions of the defendants" is sufficient under authority of Gilfallan v. Gilfallan, 168 Cal. 23, 141 P. 623, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 784.

What has been said sufficiently disposes of the appeal, and we therefore find it unnecessary to pass upon the point having to do with the admissibility in evidence of certain depositions. The point may not arise on the second trial.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. MOTT.

Cr. 3388.

Supreme Court of California.
March 17, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 16, 1931.

1. Witnesses 🔑286(4).

In murder prosecution, redirect examination of state's witness to show no gun was kept in premises where homicide occurred held proper, in view of cross-examination.

> It was sought on cross-examination to extract from the witness an admission that the deceased had reached under or into his desk as though to draw a weapon, the purpose obviously being to support defendant's testimony that he acted in self-defense.

2. Criminal law 🔑1036(1).

In murder prosecution, admission of testimony respecting decedent's possession of gun held not prejudicial, where question was asked and answered without objection.

> On redirect examination, the witness was asked whether he ever saw deceased in possession of a gun at the place where the homicide occurred, and witness answered that he had not. This testimony followed cross-examination in which defendant attempted to extract from witness an admission that deceased had reached under or into his desk as though to draw weapon.

3. Criminal law 🔑829(1).

Refusal of instruction covered by instructions given was not error.

4. Homicide 🔑309(5).

Refusal of manslaughter instruction held not error, where, under testimony, defendant was guilty of murder or not guilty at all.

RICHARDS, J.

This appeal is from a judgment of conviction of the defendant upon a charge of murder, following a verdict of guilty by the jury without recommendation. The evidence convincingly shows the defendant to have been guilty of a deliberate, premeditated, and unprovoked murder. Upon his arraignment therefor he entered a plea of "not guilty" and "not guilty by reason of insanity," and he also denied the two prior convictions of felonies charged in the information. Thereafter and before trial he withdrew his plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity," and proceeded to trial upon his plea of "not guilty," and upon his denial of his previous convictions. In statements made after his arrest and before his trial he admitted the homicide, but indicated that his only defense thereto would be that of self-defense, and upon his trial he undertook to support this plea by his own testimony, in which, however, he was contradicted by every other witness to the homicide.

ately before he was killed the deceased had reached under his desk as though, it was claimed, to draw a weapon. The purpose of this cross-examination was obviously that of seeking to support the testimony which the defendant was about to give in support of his plea that he acted in self-defense. Following this cross-examination the witness Boyer was recalled by the prosecution during the presentation of its main case, and was asked the following questions by counsel for the prosecution:

"Q. Did you ever know of a gun being kept in the premises at 1251 Market street? A. No sir.

"Mr. Elkins. We object to that on the ground that it is not proper rebuttal. This witness was on the stand before and no evidence is shown that there was a gun there.

"The Court. Objection overruled.

"Q. Have you answered the question, Mr. Witness? A. I said, 'No, sir.'

"Q. Did you ever see Thomas [the deceased] in the possession of a gun at 1251 Market street? A. No, sir."

It is the contention of the appellant that the asking of these questions and the answers given thereto constituted prejudicial error. There are several answers to this contention, the first of which would seem to be that as to the first of these questions it constituted proper redirect examination in view of the effort of the defendant's counsel upon the cross-examination of the witness Boyer to extract from the latter an admission that the deceased had reached under or into his desk as though to draw a weapon, the effect of the redirect examination being to show that there was no weapon upon the premises which the deceased could have reached for immediately before he was slain. As to the second question, a sufficient answer to the present objection thereto consists in the fact that upon the trial the question was asked and answered without objection. The appellant relies for support to his foregoing contention upon the case of People v. Hoffman, 195 Cal. 295, 302, 232 P. 974, and upon the earlier case of People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 348, 25 P. 481, 11 L. R. A. 75, which is therein cited with approval. Neither of these cases, however, presents the situation shown to exist in the instant case. It may be further stated that the affirmative evidence in this case contained in the testimony of the officers of the law who examined the premises immediately after the homicide, given without objection, shows that no weapon of any kind was found upon or in the proximity of the deceased, and that there were no firearms found in the room where he was killed. In view of the foregoing we are constrained to hold that no prejudicial error was committed by the admission of the foregoing testimony.

[3, 4] Appellant's next contention is that the court erred in its refusal to give certain instructions proposed by the defendant. These instructions were four in number, and as to the first three of them the appellant has furnished us with neither argument nor authority to show wherein the refusal to give these instructions was error. The record discloses that the matters contained therein were fully covered by instructions which the trial court had already given. With respect to the fourth of these instructions, the appellant earnestly contends that he was entitled to have it given. This instruction is to the effect that the jury upon a trial for murder was entitled to bring in a verdict of manslaughter, and the appellant therefore requested an instruction defining manslaughter, which the trial court refused to give. In the instant case, however, the defendant offered neither plea nor evidence as to any fact which would have justified the jury in finding the defendant guilty only of manslaughter. The only justification which the defendant offered for his otherwise deliberate and premeditated murder was the plea of self-defense. If the jury found that his testimony with regard to that plea was wholly unsupported and unbelievable, it had no other alternative than that of finding him guilty of a willful, unprovoked, and cold-blooded murder. Under such circumstances the authorities fully sustain the trial court in refusing to give to the jury an instruction concerning or defining manslaughter. People v. Haun, 44 Cal. 96, 100; People v. Turley, 50 Cal. 469; People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 P. 183; People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 233, 54 P. 830; People v. Chaves, 122 Cal. 134, 54 P. 596; People v. William Yee, 37 Cal. App. 579, 174 P. 343; People v. Dad, 51 Cal. App. 182, 196 P. 506; People v. Shannon, 203 Cal. 139, 143, 263 P. 522, 524. In the case last above cited this court said: "The record discloses no possible theory upon which to rest an argument that the defendant was guilty of manslaughter. Under the evidence, he was guilty of murder, or not at all. The instruction was therefore properly refused."—citing cases.

The final contention of the appellant is that the court erred in denying his motion for a new trial. In support of this contention the defendant urged the points already made, but otherwise presented nothing further in the way of argument or authority to support his said motion. It was therefore properly denied.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Arthur Crum, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from an order denying the motion of defendants Wallace I. Fox and Haddie Fox, made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate and set aside a default judgment entered against them in an action to foreclose a mortgage.

The record shows that the foreclosure action was commenced January 21, 1930; that a copy of the complaint attached to an undated summons was served on these two defendants, in the county in which the action was commenced, on January 24, 1930; that their default was entered on February 8, 1930; that judgment was entered on February 17, 1930. It further appears that on February 23, 1930, defendants discovered that judgment had been entered against them, and called on plaintiff and his attorney the same day; that on February 25, 1930, defendants sought the advice of counsel, who caused a title search of the property to be made, and on February 28, 1930, counsel informed defendants that they had a defense to the action; that on March 18, 1930, defendants served, and on March 19, 1930, filed, a notice of motion to set aside the default.

By the complaint plaintiff sought to foreclose a mortgage on real property alleged to have been executed by the defendants Fox and wife, and to secure a deficiency judgment, if a deficiency should be found to exist. The complaint originally named Wallace B. and Amelia J. Allen as parties defendant, but plaintiff dismissed as to these defendants on February 14, 1930, six days after the default of the Foxes had been taken, and three days before judgment was entered against them.

Appellants contend that their default was taken by reason of "mistake, inadvertence, surprise and excusable neglect," and that the trial court abused its discretion in denying to them the relief sought. In order to understand appellants' contentions in this regard, it is necessary to trace the history of the property which is the subject of the foreclosure action, as disclosed by the record herein.

On August 6, 1925, Brill, respondent herein, owned the real property in question. On that day, Brill sold the property to the appellants for $12,000, $7,000 being paid in cash, and the remainder evidenced by a promissory note, secured by a mortgage. It is this mortgage which is the subject of this action. On December 28, 1925, appellants sold the property to one Louis P. Mosti, who did not assume personal liability on the mortgage. Mosti, while owner of the property, subject to the above mortgage, borrowed $1,500 from Brill, respondent herein, evidencing the indebtedness with his promissory note, secured by a deed of trust. Later, on June 19, 1926, Mosti sold the property to the Allens, originally defendants herein, the Allens assuming personal liability on the mortgage. There were no intervening liens between the Fox mortgage and the Mosti trust deed. Subsequently, Mosti defaulted on his $1,500 note secured by the deed of trust, and the trustee sold the property to Brill, being conveyed to him by trustee's deed on August 24, 1927. Then, after appellants herein and their grantees had defaulted in payments on the $5,000 note, secured by this mortgage, this action of foreclosure was commenced, resulting in the taking of appellants' default, and the securing of a deficiency judgment against appellants in the sum of $4,898.08.

Appellants, in their verified answer filed with their affidavit of merits under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, set up as a proposed defense that the lien of the mortgage was merged in the fee simple title to the property acquired by respondent Brill by the trustee's deed naming Brill as grantee, dated August 14, 1927. Respondent does not contend that this defense is not a meritorious one, contenting himself with the position that appellants' default was entered due to their own gross negligence. The question as to the merits of the proposed defense is an important one, which apparently has never been directly passed upon by the courts of this state. We do not feel justified in determining whether or not the doctrine of merger would apply to the facts of this case, that question being one to be determined by the trial court in the first instance upon all the evidence. On the showing made by appellants, we will assume for the purpose of this motion that the proposed defense is a meritorious one, the only other question being as to whether the trial court abused its discretion in denying appellants' motion to be relieved from their default.

The affidavit of merits filed by appellants sets forth two major contentions, which it is contended demonstrate that the default of appellants was entered as a result of their inadvertence and excusable neglect.

1. That when appellants were served with a copy of the complaint and summons, they noted that the Allens had been made party defendants; that appellants knew that the Allens had purchased the property from Mosti in 1926, and believed in good faith that the Allens still owned the property; that, from the allegations contained in the complaint, appellants were induced to believe that the Allens were personally liable on the mortgage; that appellants believed that they (appellants) were liable only as sureties; that, because of this belief, appellants did not investigate the title. As a matter of law, although the Allens had personally assumed liability on the mortgage, they were not personally liable thereon, inasmuch as their grantor, Mosti, had not assumed the personal liability thereof. Respondent and his attorney were not aware of this fact when the complaint was filed and, for that reason, joined the Allens as party defendants. Both respondent and appellants could have discovered their mistake, had a search of the title been made. Of course, the mere fact that the Allens were or were not responsible would not relieve the appellants from liability on the mortgage as a matter of law, but, as a matter of practical consideration, it goes far in explaining appellants' neglect in failing to file an answer, believing, as they did, that the Allens would pay rather than permit a deficiency judgment to be taken against them. The allegations in the complaint as to the Allens' liability were, under such circumstances, of such a nature as reasonably to mislead the appellants. Both parties were laboring under a mistake of fact and law as to the Allens' liability.

2. That, at the time of service of the copy of the summons and complaint, appellants did not know that they had a meritorious defense to the action, based on the doctrine of merger, and that such lack of knowledge was not due to their neglect. It is alleged in the affidavit of merits that appellants believed that the Allens still owned the property and were unaware that Brill owned the property by virtue of the trustee's deed of August 14, 1927. Certainly there was nothing to put the appellants on inquiry concerning this fact. Assuming that the merger constitutes a complete defense to the foreclosure action, certainly appellants were justified in the belief that Brill had not become the owner of the property and so by his own acts rendered his cause of action valueless.

[1] We are of the opinion that the allegations of the complaint, although made in good faith, were of such a nature as to have misled the appellants, and that this factor, coupled with the ignorance of appellants as to the facts giving rise to their alleged defense, constitutes sufficient reason for granting the relief sought by the appellants.

[2-4] The legal principles underlying the granting of motions to set aside defaults are comparatively simple, and have been frequently announced by this court. The question is primarily one within the discretion of the trial court, but this discretion is not capricious or arbitrary, but it is an impartial discretion guided and controlled in its exercise by fixed legal principles.

"It is not a mental discretion, to be exercised ex gratia, but a legal discretion, to be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law, and in a manner to subserve and not to impede or defeat the ends of substantial justice." Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 422, 424, quoted with approval in Waite v. Southern Pacific, 192 Cal. 467, 470, 221 P. 204, 206. It is also well settled that it is the policy of the law to bring about a trial on the merits wherever possible, so that any doubts which may exist should be resolved in favor of the application, to the end of securing a trial upon the merits. Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 748, 124 P. 426; Waite v. Southern Pacific, supra. Although it is true that courts of appeal have shown great reluctance in cases of this kind to disturb the order of the trial court, it is equally true that denials of such relief by the trial court are scanned more carefully than cases where the trial court has granted the relief, to the end that wherever possible cases may be heard on their merits. See California National Bank v. El Dorado, 200 Cal. 452, 253 P. 704; Waite v. Southern Pacific, supra; Mitchell v. Calif., etc., S. S.

Co., 156 Cal. 576, 105 P. 590; Roehl v. Texas Co. (Cal. App.) 291 P. 262; Toon v. Pickwick Stages, 66 Cal. App. 450, 226 P. 628.

Tested by the above rules, we are of the opinion that the order of the trial court in this case should be reversed and the case heard on its merits. It does not appear that such a result will in any way injure respondent, except for the delay, and this injury can be taken care of by the trial court by the imposition of terms and conditions as provided for in section 473, Code of Civil Procedure.

For the reasons above indicated, the order refusing to vacate and set aside the judgment by default is reversed, and the cause remanded to the superior court, with direction to permit the defendants to file an answer to the plaintiffs' complaint within such time as the court may deem proper, and upon such terms as may seem just.

McCLURG v. McCLURG.

L. A. 10244.

Supreme Court of California.
March 20, 1931.

1. Divorce 🔑182.

Court, sustaining demurrer to complaint in divorce action, could enter order for payment of attorney fees and costs on appeal from order denying husband's motion for alimony (St. 1927, p. 441).

Order was made under express provisions of St. 1927, p. 441, permitting husband to apply for and receive alimony, counsel fees, and costs in an action for divorce, and cause at time order was made was still pending, regardless of order sustaining demurrer to complaint with full right in plaintiff to apply for further leave to amend pleading, and with full power of court to allow such amendment and jurisdiction to make whatever orders in action it might deem proper.

2. Divorce 🔑182.

Order allowing husband attorney's fees and costs on appeal from order denying alimony after effective date of law relating thereto was not retroactive (St. 1927, p. 441).

Although divorce action was commenced prior to the adoption and taking effect of St. 1927, p. 441, amending Civ. Code, § 137, so as to authorize recovery of alimony, counsel fees, and costs by husband, the order allowing fees and costs on appeal was entered subsequent to the effective date of such amendment.

PER CURIAM.

This appeal is from an order made by the trial court in an action for divorce, directing the plaintiff to pay to the defendant $100 as attorney's fees and $75 costs, in order to enable the defendant to prosecute an appeal which he had taken from a prior order of the trial court denying his application for $500 a month alimony and $5,000 attorney's fees and costs, which the defendant had theretofore applied for and asserted to be necessary for his support and for the proper defense of this action for divorce.

The case presents the unusual feature of a husband defendant, in an action brought against him by his wife for a divorce, applying for alimony, counsel fees, and costs, appealing from an order of the trial court denying said application, and thereupon again applying for counsel fees and costs to enable him to prosecute his said appeal; and, the trial court having granted said latter motion, it is the defendant's wife who now appeals from the order which the trial court made in this latter behalf. The respondent husband has presented and filed no brief upon this appeal, and has made no response to the order to show cause issued herein.

[1] The first contention of the appellant upon this appeal is that the order appealed from was and is void for excess of jurisdiction in the trial court to make the same. This contention is based upon the following facts: The action was commenced on April 4, 1927. Thereafter the defendant applied for an order requiring the plaintiff to pay him alimony, counsel fees, and costs, which application was on September 14, 1927, denied. Upon the same date a demurrer presented by the defendant to the second amended complaint of the plaintiff was sustained. The minute order sustaining this demurrer was silent as to whether plaintiff was to have leave to further amend her complaint. The defendant having in the meanwhile taken an appeal from the former order denying him alimony, counsel fees, and costs, he applied on September 23, 1927, for an order directing the plaintiff to pay him $100 attorney's fees and $75 costs on account of his said appeal, and the trial court on that date made such order, which is the order from which the present appeal is taken. The appellant contends that, since the trial court had, in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's second amended complaint, inserted therein no order allowing the plaintiff to further amend her pleading, and the plaintiff having made no application or been given no order for the allowance of such amendment, the court had no jurisdiction in this interim to make the order appealed from herein. There is no merit in this contention. The cause was still pending in the trial court, with the full right in the plaintiff to apply for further leave to amend her pleading, and with full power in the court to allow such further amendment, and with full jurisdiction in the court to make whatever orders in the action it might deem proper. The order which the court did make, from which this appeal is taken, was made under the express provisions of section 137 of the Civil Code as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 441), and by which amendment the terms of the original section were broadened so as to permit a husband to apply for and receive alimony, counsel fees, and costs in an action for divorce.

[2] The appellant, however, further contends that, since this action was commenced on April 4, 1927, and since section 137 of the Civil Code did not, as to said amendment thereof, become effective until August, 1927, the section as thus amended cannot be given retroactive effect so as to have application to an action commenced prior to the adoption and taking effect of the amendment; and that for this further reason the trial court had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from herein. This contention is also without merit. The provision of the Civil Code embraced in section 3 thereof, providing that "no part of it is retroactive, unless expressly so declared," has been held to have no application to purely procedural matters arising in the course of a litigation commenced before the passage or amendment of a law affecting the procedure in civil actions. 23 Cal. Jur. 632, § 28, and cases cited; Sutherland on Stat. Construction (2d Ed.) § 674; Rice v. Dunlap, 205 Cal. 134, 137, 270 P. 196; Maguire v. Cunningham, 64 Cal. App. 536, 222 P. 838. Whether, however, the said order of the trial court directing the plaintiff to pay to the defendant counsel fees and costs in order to enable him to prosecute his former appeal was a procedural or a substantive order, it was an order made after the statute had become effective permitting the trial court to make such orders in actions pending for divorce, and was not therefore retroactive in character or effect, and was not, therefore, susceptible to the attack made upon it upon this appeal.

The order is affirmed.

[1] Appeal from an order granting a new trial after verdict and judgment for defendants. The action was one for wrongful death and arose out of a collision between a light Ford truck driven by decedent and a De Martini truck driven by appellant Patten. One of the grounds specified by the court in its order granting a new trial is insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and the order cannot therefore be disturbed on appeal if the evidence is in substantial conflict and there is sufficient evidence to support a judgment for plaintiff.

Appellants insist, however, that there was no evidence that defendants were guilty of negligence, and that under the evidence the decedent was guilty of negligence as a matter of law.

[2] The collision occurred on the highway north of Santa Cruz shortly after dark. The decedent, Aldon E. Robinson, was driving his Ford truck in a northerly direction on this highway, and appellant Patten was driving the De Martini truck in a southerly direction. No other person was present when the collision occurred except the drivers of the two trucks, and consequently the only eyewitness who testified at the trial was appellant Patten. There was testimony, however, of the sheriff of the county that when he arrived at the scene of the accident there were skid marks on the road about seventy feet in length which led to the De Martini truck. At the place where these marks commenced, the right mark was about five feet from the right side of the road and the left mark about six feet from the left side of the road. From this the jury would be entitled to find that the marks were made by the wheels of the De Martini truck and that it was then being driven partly on the left side of the highway. Appellants' claim, that there is nothing to show that the marks did not commence after the point of collision, is answered by the testimony of appellant Patten himself that his truck proceeded only thirty-nine or forty feet after the collision, while the skid marks as testified to by the sheriff were seventy feet long. If the jury chose to believe this evidence, they could find that the De Martini truck was partly on the left side of the center of the road for at least thirty feet before the collision occurred. We conclude that there was sufficient evidence to support a finding of appellants' negligence.

[3] Appellants' contention that the decedent was guilty of negligence as a matter of law is predicated on the testimony of Patten that the lights of the Ford truck were not burning. Against this evidence respondent invokes the presumption that the deceased used due care for his own safety, thus raising the debatable question of law as to whether a disputable presumption can support a finding where contradicted by positive testimony to the contrary (Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co. [Cal. Sup.] 287 P. 343), in which a rehearing has been granted by the Supreme Court. We do not feel called upon in this case to attempt to anticipate the ultimate ruling of the Supreme Court in the Smellie Case because, as respondent points out, there is positive evidence in the record from the witness King that at a point which could not have been more than a few hundred yards from the point of collision he passed the Ford truck driven by the deceased and its lights were burning, and testimony that after the collision the light switch of the Ford truck was found to be turned on. While this is only circumstantial evidence that the lights were burning at the time of the collision, it is in our judgment sufficiently strong, if believed, to contradict the direct testimony of Patten. Parsons v. Easton, 184 Cal. 764, 769, 195 P. 419.

[4, 5] Furthermore the jury was entitled to believe that Patten had willfully sworn falsely as to material matters, in which event his testimony as to the lights could be disbelieved. Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3. In this connection it is sufficient to point out that Patten testified that at all times before the collision he was entirely on the right of the center of the highway, whereas the evidence would justify a finding that this was not true as pointed out above. Patten also testified that he saw the Ford truck when it was about thirty feet away. In this he was contradicted by the sheriff's testimony that shortly after the collision Patten told him that he did not see the Ford truck until he was within six or eight feet of it. If the jury concluded that Patten had willfully sworn falsely in these particulars, it would be at liberty to disbelieve all of his testimony, in which event the presumption that the deceased exercised due care would stand uncontradicted.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

March 13, 1931.

Appeal and error ⚷934(2).

In action for materials furnished, reviewing court, resolving all intendments in favor of judgment for defendant, must assume evidence supported judgment (Civ. Code, § 2258).

> Reviewing court must assume that from the evidence before the court it appeared that orders presented to defendant for payment were not acceptable until inspection should show work was progressing and that account was in order, and further that such orders were not accepted and were not due or payable for the reason that these conditions were not fulfilled. The owner of the real property had executed to defendant corporation a mortgage to secure a loan for the payment of costs of labor and materials for building upon such property, and the lender held in trust the principal fund so secured for disbursement for such purposes upon orders to be issued by the owner.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

Judgment having been rendered in favor of the defendant, a mortgagee of real property, in an action against it by materialmen, based upon orders from the owner for payment of material bills from the amount of a loan, the plaintiffs appealed.

The owner of real property in Los Angeles county executed to respondent corporation a mortgage to secure a loan for the payment of costs of labor and materials for building upon said property, and the lender held in trust or "escrow" the principal fund so secured for disbursement for such purposes, upon orders to be issued by the owner. It is inferred that the trustee was controlled and guided in the performance of its duties by certain written instructions or conditions requiring approval and acceptance of the orders, but the record fails to disclose their provisions. It is conceded that appellants furnished certain materials for construction work upon its printed forms, which were paid. The orders in controversy were received by appellants in like manner, and were in turn presented to respondent for payment, and receipts were given therefor, but they were not paid. Appellants instituted an action for the alleged indebtedness for said materials, as arising "out of certain orders executed in favor of plaintiffs by one J. F. Mullen upon funds of the said J. F. Mullen at said time in the hands of the defendant and which said orders were accepted by the defendant, and by reason of said acceptance of said orders the defendant was and is indebted to the plaintiffs." Upon conflicting evidence as to this issue, the trial court found that the defendant was not indebted to the plaintiffs, and rendered judgment accordingly. This appeal is founded entirely upon specifications that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence.

Each of the orders provided that the "money, check or its proceeds is requested and received for the express purpose of paying bills and claims for labor performed and/or materials used in the construction or completion of the certain building * * * all in accordance with escrow instructions covering the loan or fund from which this money is received and it is hereby represented that such money, check or its proceeds will be used for said purpose or purposes and no other whatsoever." It was testified by a representative of respondent that when the orders were presented he informed appellants that they would not be immediately due, but would be payable when the work was in, "provided the job was kept running steadily and the account was in order." Resolving all intendments in favor of the findings and judgment, we must assume that from the evidence before the court it appeared that the orders were not acceptable until inspection should reveal that the work was progressing in a regular manner and that the account was in order, and, further, that such orders were not accepted and were not due or payable for the reason that these conditions were not fulfilled. Civ. Code, § 2258. Authorities cited by appellants were based upon orders which had been accepted, and are therefore not in point.

The judgment is affirmed.

PHELPS v. ARNOLD.

Civ. 7733.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 13, 1931.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1004(1).

Reviewing court will not interfere with determination of damages, unless verdict is obviously so disproportionate to injuries as to justify belief that verdict is not result of dispassionate discretion of jury.

2. Appeal and error 🔑932(1).

Where trial court reduced jury's verdict to approximately one-fifth, presumption of passion, prejudice, or corruption as to reduced amount would be almost completely overcome.

3. New trial 🔑162(1).

Where jury was warranted in assessing punitive damages, trial judge in reducing verdict had same power.

4. Appeal and error 🔑932(2).

Where no request was made to segregate compensatory and punitive damages, reviewing court regarded both elements of damages as entering into verdict.

5. Assault and battery 🔑40.

Upon evidence indicating violent unprovoked assault, trial court did not abuse its discretion in reducing $3,500 verdict to $750, notwithstanding less might have compensated plaintiff.

6. Assault and battery 🔑15.

Home owner may use reasonable force to eject trespassers.

7. Assault and battery 🔑15.

Plaintiff, ordered to remain away, visiting defendant's home to present written demand notice prepared by her attorney, was trespasser, and defendant was justified in using reasonable force to eject her.

> The demand notice was for the return of money alleged to have been given by plaintiff's husband to defendant. The notice, prepared by plaintiff's counsel, set up the fact of community ownership in the money, a brief résumé of the law, and plaintiff's demand for the return of the money.

8. Trespass 🔑44.

Presumption of invitation to visit home never arises against expressed disavowal thereof.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1067.

In action for assault, refusing instruction upon defendant's right to use reasonable force to eject trespasser from his property held prejudicial error.

> Only instruction on the point in question given by the court stated to the jury that it was the duty of defendant at all times to protect his family and home from the attack, and that if the jury found there was an attack, defendant might use such physical force as was reasonably necessary to eject any person therefrom, thereby leaving jury with erroneous notion that, to justify ejection of trespasser from home, an attack was required. In addition, the question whether plaintiff had suffered any actual damage was sharply contested.

10. Assault and battery 🔑15.

Where plaintiff, ordered to remain away from defendant's premises, made apparently hostile entry in defiance of order, defendant could use reasonable force to eject plaintiff, without just ordering plaintiff to leave.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1070(1).

Prejudicial error, precluding fair hearing on merits, cannot be cured by reducing damages found.

Action by Evelyn Mary Phelps against Gloyd S. Arnold. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

D. Chase Rich, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

The action was commenced to recover damages alleged to have resulted to plaintiff from an assault made upon her by the defendant. The complaint characterized the assault as unprovoked and malicious and alleged numerous injuries sustained and asked damages, both compensatory and punitive. The trial was by jury and the verdict was in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $3,500. On motion for a new trial the court below ordered a remission of the damages to the end that unless plaintiff consented to accept the sum of $750 in full satisfaction, a new trial would be ordered. Thereupon plaintiff remitted the excess and judgment was entered in her favor for the amount of $750.

Defendant on this appeal urges but two grounds for reversal, namely, excessive damages and error in the refusal of certain proposed instructions.

[1-5] The rule regarding damages is well settled in this jurisdiction to the effect that the matter of damages is one which must be left almost entirely to the determination of the trial court, and that reviewing courts will not interfere unless the verdict is obviously so disproportionate to the injuries received as to justify the belief that it is not the result of cool and dispassionate discretion of the jury. Szasz v. Joyland Co., 84 Cal. App. 264, 257 P. 871. The rule is likewise stated in Kelley v. Hodge Transportation System, 197 Cal. 598, at page 610, 242 P. 76, 81, as follows: "Unless we are able to say that the award of damages made by the jury and sustained by the trial court were grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as presented to us on appeal as to shock the sense of justice and raise at once a presumption that it was the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than an honest and sober judgment, this court may not exercise the power of revision." As a corollary to the rule it would follow that where the record discloses a review of the amount assessed by the jury, in the court below, and a diminution thereof to the extent of reducing the same to approximately 20 per cent. of the amount returned in the verdict, the presumption of passion, prejudice, or corruption would be almost completely overcome in as far as it could affect the reduced amount. The facts of the case before us disclose a situation wherein the jury would have been warranted in assessing punitive damages and they were instructed to that effect by the trial court should they find in favor of plaintiff. In the diminution of the verdict the trial judge had the same power. Just what portion of the awarded sum is for compensatory damages and what portion as punitive damages does not appear. There being no request, either to the court or jury, for such a segregation, we regard both elements of damage as entering into the total and properly so. Bloomberg v. Laventhal, 179 Cal. 620, 178 P. 496. With the foregoing in mind it becomes unnecessary to detail all of the facts of the case. There was sufficient evidence to indicate that plaintiff was forcibly and violently assaulted without provocation and that while her damage, in so far as permanent injuries was concerned, might have been fully compensated by even a lesser amount, that was a matter within the sound discretion of the trial judge and we cannot hold that discretion to have been abused.

The next phase of the appeal involves the matter of refused instructions. A proper consideration of the question necessitates a brief review of the facts. Plaintiff and defendant resided in adjoining homes, not the same building, however. The husband of the plaintiff was an aged man, a veteran of the Civil War, and retired from active work. There seems to have been the usual neighborly intercourse between the families manifested in exchange of services looking to the improvement of the properties and in other similar contacts. Both defendant and his wife displayed some little interest in the aged husband and the latter would often spend his leisure time with them. As time went on the plaintiff became somewhat resentful towards this intimacy, particularly when she became informed of the fact that her husband was making small gifts of money to the defendants. There then arose a feud between the clans. Much bickering followed and finally an open rupture. The women of the household came almost into physical encounter on the premises of defendant, on which occasion the plaintiff was ordered to remain away from the home or property of defendant. At this time plaintiff sought counsel, and as a result thereof she procured advice to the effect that the earnings of the husband during coverture were community property and that the husband had no legal right to dissipate or give away these earnings without the consent of the wife. She obtained from her counsel a notice of demand for the return of the moneys alleged to have been given by her husband to the defendants, and on the day of the alleged assault or the night thereof, she again visited the house of defendant to serve upon the latter the prepared notice, which, to repeat, set up the fact of community ownership, a brief résumé of the law, and her demand for the return of the money. This is the written demand hereinafter referred to as "Defendant's Exhibit A." It was on this occasion that the assault complained of occurred. The plaintiff's testimony, if believed, showed a violent assault. The defendant, on the other hand, claimed that he gently led her off the premises, using some force only when and as plaintiff resisted removal and began an attack upon him. The evidence of injury offered by plaintiff was practically overcome by the testimony of her attending physicians and by other competent proof; also, for what purpose hardly discernible, it was before the jury that upon a criminal complaint against defendant he was acquitted.

With this picture of the controversy we can approach the instructions. The following instructions were offered and requested by defendant and refused:

A. "You are instructed that the paper served upon the defendant on March 11, 1927, by the plaintiff * * * is not a 'legal paper or notice,' and is not such a paper or notice as the law, in any case, would require to be personally served upon the defendant."

B. "You are instructed that if you find that the plaintiff had been notified by the defendant, or his wife, prior to March 11, 1927, that the plaintiff should thereafter keep off the property of the defendant, and that the plaintiff thereafter keep off the property of the defendant, and that the plaintiff thereafter on March 11, 1927, went upon the property of defendant for the purpose of serving the paper, defendant's exhibit 'A' upon the defendant, that such act of the plaintiff is not justified in law and was a trespass upon the property and rights of the defendant, and that the defendant, upon that occasion was justified in using reasonable physical force to eject the plaintiff from his property."

[6-11] The last-quoted offered instruction practically embraced the first, and therefore our discussion will be addressed to the said instruction. It is elemental that an owner of premises, such as are being discussed, to wit, his home, is justified in using reasonable force to eject trespassers. The doctrine of the law in this respect is quite fully discussed in the case of Walker v. Chanslor, 153 Cal. 118, 94 P. 606, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 455, 126 Am. St. Rep. 61, and many of the authorities, ancient and modern, are therein collated. The rule therein announced is the common-law rule that an owner has the right to forcibly eject trespassers and if the force used is not excessive, the trespasser has no personal action against the owner. The correctness of the ruling has never been questioned and now stands as the accepted law of this jurisdiction. In the case before us it was not disputed that the alleged assault took place at the home of the defendant. Nor can it be disputed that the plaintiff, if she had been ordered or requested to remain away from the premises, particularly after unfriendly relations had been established, was a trespasser upon these premises. By no stretch of principle can it be declared that because plaintiff was presenting a written demand, theretofore repudiated, this fact made her entry of a character distinguished from trespass. The evidence discloses this same demand had been made prior to the time in question and payment refused and liability denied. There was nothing that required the presentation in writing and there was, in effect, no greater right conferred by reducing the claim to writing than if the plaintiff had renewed her oral demand. We think that plaintiff at the time in question was clearly without right and a trespasser. The invitation presumed to be extended to all that may have business at one's home does not survive when the facts disclose a condition such as here. Had there been no previous trouble between the parties, the presumption of invitation might be indulged, but it never arises against the expressed disavowal thereof. The liability of the defendant therefore rested upon two questions. Was the plaintiff a trespasser, and, if so, was the amount or degree of force used reasonable under the circumstances? Before the jury could intelligently pass upon the question of whether or not there had been an unlawful assault, it must first determine the status of the parties at the time the assault is alleged to have occurred. On this point the jury had absolutely no instruction. We have carefully read the instructions that were given, and we find that the only instructions on the point stated to the jury that it was the duty of the husband at all times to protect his wife, family, and home from the attack of any person, and that if the jury found there was an attack the husband might use such physical force as was reasonably necessary to eject any person as might be necessary from his home or property. This left the jury with the notion that in order to justify the use of even reasonable force in ejecting a trespasser from the home there must be an attack. No other construction can be put upon this plain language. We think that the trial court was clearly in error in refusing to give the requested instruction. In Townsend v. Briggs, 99 Cal. 481, at page 483, 34 P. 116, 117, it is said: "A man's house is his castle, and that he has the right to defend it against an intruder with all the force reasonably necessary to the defense. Of course, in such a case, a man would be liable for the result of a brutal use of force clearly beyond what the occasion warranted; but, in determining such a question, due allowance should always be made for the difficulty which a reasonable man would have in measuring, under exciting circumstances, the exact amount of force necessary; and it is extremely important that a jury, in passing upon such a case, should not in any way be misled by an instruction of the court." And following the same line of reasoning it is likewise extremely important that a jury should be fully instructed upon the law applicable. Here, as noted, the defense of appellant was restricted to proof of an attack. It is urged that the law requires an owner to first order or request the trespasser off the premises before any use of force is justified. This has been declared to be the law only under the circumstances present in the particular case wherein the rule is announced. In any event this rule would not affect our conclusions here, even though in a measure applicable. In the first place, the refused instruction embodies the rule, in that it specifies the finding of a notice not to enter the premises before plaintiff can be held a trespasser. And, further, a fair interpretation of the rule does not mean that a trespasser must be given more than one notice or request or order. After an unfriendly feeling has developed culminating in quarrel and encounter and plaintiff had then been ordered to remain away from the premises, it was not a requirement that upon re-entry she should again be ordered to leave; it being apparent that her entry was hostile and in defiance of the former order. Also, the necessity of request to leave was, in a sense, embraced in the use of the term reasonable force and could by implication be read into that phase of the proffered instruction; it being manifest that a determination of the reasonableness of the force used involved question of necessity of any force whatsoever. Holding the action of the trial court error, it is obvious that such error was prejudicial. This is demonstrated by the fact that the trial court must have deemed the amount of the verdict to have been the result of passion or prejudice. The reduction of the verdict from $3,500 to $750 clearly indicates the trial court's opinion. A mere reduction of the amount, however, is not a complete solution of the question. The defendant is entitled to a fair trial and to the jury's determination of all questions involved, including amount of damages. We do not criticize the practice of trial judges reducing the amount returned in the verdict of a jury in appropriate cases and particularly in cases where no other substantial error occurs. But we do hold that errors prejudicial to a party's cause, the effect of which is to preclude a fair and impartial hearing on the merits, cannot be cured by the reduction of the amount of damage found. There was a sharp conflict in the evidence. The question of whether or not plaintiff had suffered any actual damage was hotly contested. Her attending physician found nothing worthy of mention. The jurors who had sat on the criminal case wherein the same issue was tried within a few days after the alleged assault testified that no mention was made of injury nor was any shown nor did the physical appearance of the plaintiff indicate any of the injuries complained of.

We think that the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: SPENCE, Acting P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

Defect in information charging extortion in failing to allege money was obtained with injured person's consent did not require reversal (Pen. Code §§ 518, 960, 1258, 1404; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

The evidence, direct and indirect, showed that money in question was obtained with consent of injured person by use of fear, and therefore there was no miscarriage of justice under Const. art. 6, § 4½, and defendant was not prejudiced within meaning of Pen. Code, §§ 960, 1258, or 1404.

2. Threats 🔑1(1).

Fear, such as will constitute extortion, may be induced by threat to accuse person of crime (Pen. Code § 519).

3. Criminal law 🔑404(4).

In extortion prosecution, articles which defendant took from witnesses held admissible to corroborate their testimony that defendant made similar threats to them and took articles from them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; H. G. Jorgensen, Judge.

Albert Francisco was convicted of extortion, and he appeals.

J. M. Lopes, of Tulare, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM.

The defendant was charged by an information filed in the superior court of Monterey county with the crime of extortion, to which he entered a plea of not guilty. A jury returned a verdict of conviction, and he has appealed from the judgment entered thereon.

As grounds for his appeal it is alleged that the information failed to state facts constituting a public offense; that the verdict is unsupported; that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to the introduction of certain evidence and in instructing the jury.

[1] The information alleged in substance that defendant feloniously extorted and obtained from Josephine M. Marks a sum of money by falsely representing himself to be a public officer, and threatened to cause her arrest for illegally possessing intoxicating liquor in case the amount was not paid, and that the payment was induced by defendant's threats and the unlawful use of fear.

Section 518 of the Penal Code defines extortion as follows: "Extortion is the obtaining of property from another, with his consent, induced by a wrongful use of force or fear, or under color of official right." The information failed to allege that the money was obtained with the consent of Mrs. Marks, and it is urged that the pleading was consequently insufficient.

It was so held in People v. Hoffman, 126 Cal. 366, 58 P. 856; but since the adoption of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution no error in any matter of pleading is ground for reversal which does not result in a miscarriage of justice; and in the case at bar the evidence, direct and indirect, shows beyond reasonable doubt that the money in question was obtained with the consent of Mrs. Marks by the use of fear. In view of the facts there was no miscarriage of justice; nor was the defendant prejudiced within the meaning of sections 960, 1258 or 1404 of the Penal Code. People v. Hinshaw, 194 Cal. 1, 227 P. 156; People v. Kuder, 93 Cal. App. 42, 269 P. 198, 630.

[2] Defendant further claims that there was no evidence that Mrs. Marks had committed a crime, and that consequently the verdict is unsupported. As to this contention it will be sufficient to cite section 519 of the Penal Code, which provides that fear such as will constitute extortion may be induced by a threat to accuse a person of a crime.

[3] In order to show intent and that the alleged offense was a part of a common scheme or plan, witnesses testified to similar threats made to them, and that defendant, claiming to be a public officer, took from their possession at the time certain articles of jewelry and other personal property, all of which was found in his possession at the time of his arrest. These articles were admitted as evidence tending to corroborate the testimony of the witnesses mentioned, and were competent for that purpose.

We find no merit in the further claim that the court's instructions were erroneous or misleading.

The evidence was amply sufficient to support the verdict, and the evidence discloses no error which can reasonably be said to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

DREYER et al. v. CYRIACKS.

Civ. 7654.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Feb. 28, 1931.

1. New trial 🔑6.

Granting or refusing new trial is largely within trial court's discretion.

2. New trial 🔑157.

In considering motion for new trial, trial court is not bound by rule of conflicting evidence binding appellate tribunal.

3. New trial 🔑157.

In considering motion for new trial, trial court must weigh evidence for both parties, determine conclusions for itself, and grant new trial, if satisfied verdict is contrary to weight of evidence.

4. New trial 🔑157.

Though evidence is not conflicting and all proofs apparently favorable to one party, probative force or evidentiary value is for trial court in considering motion for new trial.

5. Appeal and error 🔑933(1).

In reviewing order setting verdict aside as excessive, every intendment is indulged in support of order.

6. Appeal and error 🔑979(5).

Order setting verdict aside as excessive and granting new trial will not be disturbed, if its propriety is debatable.

7. Appeal and error 🔑933(4).

On appeal, order granting new trial because verdict was excessive may be construed as meaning trial court was not satisfied evidence supported verdict regarding extent of damage.

> Declaration of trial court that verdict is excessive does not necessarily mean that trial court was of opinion that verdict was result of passion or prejudice.

8. Appeal and error 🔑979(5).

Under evidence regarding value of killed dog, trial court held justified in holding award of $100,000 actual damages as grossly excessive.

> While several witnesses estimated value of dog to be from $150,000 to $200,000, in view of other testimony in case showing amounts dog earned in motion pictures and other matters, it was obvious estimates fixed were fabulous and based entirely on fanciful speculation.

9. Animals 🔑44.

In action for damages for killing of dog, award of $25,000 punitive damages, in addition to actual damages, held grossly excessive (Civ. Code, § 3340).

> It appeared from evidence that, as one of owners of dog, with companions, was leaving defendant's home in automobile, following quarrel which had taken place there, defendant fired three shots from rifle at automobile, one of bullets embedding itself in tire, another passing through hat of one of occupants of automobile, and third penetrating rear of automobile and striking and killing plaintiffs' dog, which, unknown to defendant, was riding on rear seat of automobile. Testimony conflicted as to particular circumstances of quarrel and as to who was party at fault in quarrel.

10. Animals ⚷44.

In action for killing of valuable dog acting in motion pictures, standard in determining value of human life held inapplicable (Pen. Code, § 491).

Pen. Code, § 491, provides that dogs are personal property, and their value is to be ascertained in same manner as value of other property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Charles B. Dreyer and another against Fred B. Cyriacks. Verdict in favor of plaintiffs. From an order setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

John T. Mulligan, of Long Beach, and Gerard Remington, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bailie, Turner & Lake and W. I. Gilbert, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J.

While the plaintiff Faust, accompanied by two companions, named Richardson and Kempin, were leaving the home of the defendant Cyriacks in an automobile, following a quarrel which had taken place there, Cyriacks fired three shots from a rifle at the automobile. One of the bullets embedded itself in the spare tire, another hit Kempin's hat, and the other penetrated the rear of the automobile and struck and killed a dog belonging to plaintiffs, which, unknown to Cyriacks, was riding on the rear seat with Kempin. Thereafter plaintiffs brought this action for damages for the killing of the dog, and upon trial in the superior court of Los Angeles county a jury awarded them $100,000 actual and $25,000 punitive damages. The trial court set aside the verdict and granted a new trial, one of the grounds being that the verdict was excessive.

The dog was of the breed known as German police dog, and the scene of the shooting was in or near Hollywood, the dog being worked in the moving picture industry and known as "Peter the Great." All of the interested parties to this controversy are connected with the same industry. The circumstances leading up to the shooting are sharply conflicting, and it would be unnecessary to inquire into them, except that under section 3340 of the Civil Code exemplary damages may be awarded "for wrongful injuries to animals being subjects of property, committed willfully or by gross negligence, in disregard of humanity"; and the jury awarded plaintiffs an extra $25,000 to cover such element. It appears from the evidence that on the night of the shooting all of the parties had been drinking, and that there was considerable animosity existing between Faust and Cyriacks, which arose over the fact that several days previously Faust had called at Cyriacks' home while he was away, and, as he claims, insulted his housekeeper.

The shooting took place shortly after dark. Late that afternoon Richardson and his wife were making a call at Faust's house and a quarrel took place between Richardson and his wife, because she persisted in petting Peter the Great after he had shown a dislike for her by snapping at her; and Mrs. Richardson left. Thereupon Richardson and Faust started out to find her in Richardson's automobile, taking Kempin and Peter the Great along with them in the back seat. After searching the streets in the immediate vicinity they went to Cyriacks' house, where he was entertaining some friends, to see if she was there. Faust testified that he went to the door and inquired for Mrs. Richardson, and that after a few words Cyriack struck at him; that Richardson then came up and asked for his wife; whereupon Cyriacks sicked his police dog on Richardson; that Cyriacks then turned to go into the house for his gun, and that as he did so Faust and Richardson returned to the automobile and started to drive away; that they had proceeded about halfway down the driveway when Cyriacks began shooting, with the result already stated. Faust's testimony was supported generally by the testimony of Richardson. Cyriacks gave conflicting accounts of the shooting, but the substance of the testimony he gave in court was as follows: He stated that Faust appeared at his door and asked for a drink; that, observing that Faust had already been drinking, he told him that he had had enough; whereupon Faust told Cyriacks to bring out his (Cyriacks') dog and he would throw him in the fishpond; that he then took Faust by the arm, and, as they proceeded toward the fishpond, Cyriacks' dog ran out toward the automobile; that he called the dog back and Faust struck the dog over the nose; that Cyriacks then struck Faust and knocked him down; that Faust then dashed into Cyriacks' house, grabbed a revolver from a holster hanging near the door and called to Richardson to bring his gun; that Cyriacks then went into the house, brought out his rifle and fired down the driveway; that Faust and Richardson then got in the automobile and drove away. The guests at Cyriacks' house corroborated his statements. Cyriacks denied knowing that Kempin or Peter the Great were in the automobile, and there is no testimony in the record to show that he had any reason to believe they were there.

[1-6] The well-settled rule is that the matter of granting or refusal to grant a motion for a new trial is largely within the discretion of the trial court (Work v. Whittington, 61 Cal. App. 302, 214 P. 474); that in passing upon such motion the trial court is not bound by the rule of conflicting evidence as is the appellate tribunal (Huckaby v. Northam, 68 Cal. App. 83, 228 P. 717; Smith v. Royer, 181 Cal. 165, 183 P. 660); but must weigh and consider the evidence for both parties and determine for itself the just conclusion to be drawn from it (Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 78 P. 337; Rudin v. Luman, 53 Cal. App. 212, 199 P. 874); and, if it is satisfied that the finding of the jury is contrary to the weight of the evidence, it may grant a new trial (Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 506, 123 P. 288). Even where the evidence is not conflicting and all the proof seems to be favorable to one or the other of the parties litigant, the question of the probative force or the evidentiary value of the testimony is nevertheless within the determination of the trial court in a proceeding on motion for a new trial. Otten v. Spreckels, 24 Cal. App. 251, 141 P. 224; Roberts v. Southern Pacific Co., 54 Cal. App. 315, 201 P. 958. It may be conceded that the rule controlling in cases where the reviewing court is asked to reverse a judgment upon the ground of excessive verdict, after the trial court has refused to set aside the same, is that the verdict must stand unless it is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong presumption that it is based on prejudice, passion, or corruption, rather than sober judgment. Szasz v. Joyland Co., 84 Cal. App. 259, 257 P. 871; Reneau v. Hirsch, 88 Cal. App. 1, 262 P. 1100; Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 205 P. 1073. But where, as here, we are asked to review the act of the court, where, in the exercise of its discretionary power, it has seen fit to set aside the verdict on this ground, a very different rule prevails. Every intendment is to be indulged here in support of the action of the court below, and it will not be disturbed if the question of its propriety be open to debate. Harrison v. Sutter Street R. R. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 P. 1019.

[7] Furthermore, where a trial court grants a new trial upon the ground that the verdict is excessive, the declaration of the court that it is excessive does not necessarily mean that the trial court was of the opinion that the verdict was the result of passion or prejudice. It is susceptible of the interpretation that the trial court was not satisfied that the finding of the jury as to the extent of the damage suffered by the plaintiff was supported by the evidence adduced upon that phase of the case. Meinberg v. Jordan, 29 Cal. App. 760, 157 P. 1005, 1007.

[8, 9] In the present case several witnesses estimated the value of the dog to be from $150,000 to $200,000, but, in view of the other testimony in the case showing the amounts the dog had earned, etc., it is obvious the estimates fixed by these witnesses were fabulous, and based entirely on fanciful speculation. Consequently, under the authorities above cited, the trial court was not bound to accept the same and was more than justified in holding that the award of $100,000 was grossly excessive. Moreover, it would seem to require no discussion to point out that, under the circumstances under which the shooting took place, the award of $25,000 as punitive damages was likewise grossly excessive.

[10] With reference to the question of the amount of the verdict plaintiffs have cited us to an array of cases from thirty states of the Union and from England and Canada. But not one of them relates to the destruction of an animal. They all concern the death of or injury to human beings, and it is absurd to argue that in fixing damages the value of human lives and the value of dogs are to be measured by the same standard. As declared in section 491 of the Penal Code, "Dogs are personal property, and their value is to be ascertained in the same manner as the value of other property," but certainly the value of a human life is not to be so determined.

Plaintiffs say in their brief: "* * * It must be remembered, that Peter the Great was a motion picture star, he was a gift to humanity. 'Peter the Great' is a name that will go down in history as the most human like dog that ever displayed its skill in a film drama. His name was a symbol of loyalty, devotion, nobility, and heroic exploits. Peter the Great, king of the silver screen, was the playmate of mankind. He lived and struggled, suffered and sacrificed, to make countless thousands happy and cheerful. He made the multitude laugh and cry, wonder and admire. Peter the Great sent them to their homes with pictures of high ideals and unselfish service; the clean, the pure, the good in thought, example and action. Peter the Great was a by-word of every household, a wonderword to every child lover of the motion picture world. And when he came to the last scene, in the drama of life, when the curtain of death was slowly ringing down and he was going into that long, long sleep, I know he felt that it was only a new act he was performing as a part of his life work, as a part of some cruel tragedy, and he seemed to smile as the lights went out." Whatever virtue there may be in the foregoing sentiments as a tribute to the memory of Peter the Great, they certainly carry little convincing force as a legal argument in support of the theory that the measure of damages for the destruction of a dog is or should be the same as the one applied in actions growing out of the death of a human being.

The conclusion we have reached upon the action of the trial court in granting a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was excessive makes it unnecessary to consider the second ground upon which the order was based, namely, erroneous instructions.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

STATE COMPENSATION INSURANCE FUND v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 7792.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 4, 1931.

1. Master and servant 🔑403.

Claimant not within class conclusively presumed dependent must show dependency in compensation proceedings, and must further show amount actually devoted by deceased employee to his support (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act [St. 1917, p. 844]).

2. Master and servant 🔑388.

Amount devoted by employee to dependent's support must be applied wholly to that purpose in order that compensation may be fixed thereby (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act [St. 1917, p. 844]).

3. Master and servant 🔑405(5).

Finding of Industrial Accident Commission of partial dependency upon deceased employee of minor children of employee's cousin held not supported by evidence (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act [St. 1917, p. 844]).

The evidence disclosed that the deceased employee had stayed with his cousin for three months, paying board, and that thereafter he sent two checks to his cousin, but there was no evidence showing the amount contributed by him to the support of the minor children of his cousin, and no evidence showing that any particular sum was actually applied to that purpose; but the father of the children merely stated that the money was turned over to his wife, and that he had no knowledge as to how she disposed of it.

4. Witnesses 🔑37(1).

Witness having testified that he has no knowledge of subject-matter disqualifies himself on that subject (Code Civ. Proc. § 1845).

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Spiros Paizes in behalf of minor children for the death of G. S. Paizes, opposed by the State Compensation Insurance Fund. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the insurance carrier petitions for review.

Award annulled and matter remanded.

Henry G. Sanford and B. E. Pemberton, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

The petitioner is the insurance carrier of the city and county of San Francisco, the employer of one G. S. Paizes, who was instantly killed in an explosion upon the work being conducted by the water department of the city near the town of Sunol. Spiros Paizes and the deceased were first cousins. The former was married and lived in San Francisco with his wife and four children. An unmarried brother of Spiros lived with him, paying $45 a month for board and room. Spiros conducted a barber shop from which he earned from $100 to $140 per month upon which, for many years past, he had supported his family. In January, 1930, the deceased came to live with Spiros, and he too paid $45 a month for board and room. This relation continued for three months when, in April, 1930, the deceased moved to Sunol and entered the employment of the city, where he remained until June 8th, the date of his death.

During his residence with the Paizes family the deceased became attached to the two younger children—a boy of seven and a girl of five years—and contributed considerable sums to their support. After he moved to Sunol he sent two checks to Spiros—one for $57.75 and another for $62.25. These checks were cashed by Spiros and the proceeds were turned over to his wife. Upon the testimony of Spiros alone as to an oral agreement of the deceased to adopt and care for these minors, and as to the disposition of the funds received from the deceased, the commission concluded that these two minors were dependents of the deceased to the extent of $1,200 a year and awarded the full sum of $3,600 to the father "to be received by him in his own right and disbursed in his own discretion for such purpose" (the support of said minors). In this proceeding the petitioner insists that the evidence fails to show that the minors were dependents within the meaning of the Compensation Act and that they were not members of the same family or household.

[1] We are compelled to agree with petitioner that there is no evidence to support the amount of the award made, and hence we will confine our discussion to that subject. Section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution permits the enactment of a Workmen's Compensation Act for the benefit of "all workmen and those dependent upon them for support." Section 14, subdivision c, of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 844) provides, in part, that, "No person shall be considered a dependent of any deceased employee unless in good faith a member of the family or household of such employee." The purpose of these enactments is to place the burden of caring for the dependents upon the industry in which the "breadwinner" was employed rather than upon the public in general. In order to profit under the terms of the act it is necessary for the applicant to show: First, that he is a dependent; and second, the amount actually devoted by the employee to such support.

Webster defines a "dependent" as "one who is sustained by another, or who relies on another for support or favor." Except in those cases in which wives, children, and others are conclusively presumed, under the act, to be dependent, "questions as to who constitute dependents and the extent of their dependency shall be determined in accordance with the fact, as the fact may be at the time of the injury of the employee." Compensation Act, § 14, subd. b. There being no conclusive presumption of dependency because of the relation of the applicants to the deceased, it became incumbent upon the commission to determine "the extent of their dependency" as of the time of the employee's death.

[2-4] In our review of the record we are unable to find any evidence supporting the commission's finding that the minors were partially dependent upon deceased to the extent of $1,200 a year. The testimony of the father discloses that he had at no time relinquished his rights or obligations as a parent of the applicants, but that he had accepted sums of money from the deceased for the care and support of the children in accordance with the assurance of the deceased that he desired to take care of these children. There was no evidence that these moneys, or any particular portion of them, were actually devoted to the support of these minors. The father testified that the deceased paid him $45 a month for his board and room and that he gave this money to his wife and thought she had used it for these minors. He also testified that during the three months from January to April, 1930, the deceased purchased many pairs of shoes, suits, and dresses for the minors and gave him some additional money which he in turn handed to his wife and which he thought his wife applied to the board and lodging of these minors at the rate of $35 each per month. The witness testified that he was a barber earning between $100 and $140 a month with which he supported himself, his wife and four children; that it cost him about $175 a month to keep his family; and that the money received from his brother and from the deceased for board and room was turned over to his wife who made the purchases and paid the bills for the maintenance of the family. As to the money actually spent by the deceased for the benefit of the applicants and as to the money devoted to that purpose by his wife the witness stated that he had no knowledge. The wife was not called as a witness and the "extent of their dependency" is, therefore, left wholly to conjecture. If the witness had testified as to what his wife had told him, such hearsay evidence would have given some support to a finding (Perry v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 180 Cal. 497, 498, 499, 181 P. 788), but the witness having said that he had no knowledge of the subject matter, he thereby disqualified himself as a witness on that subject. Code Civ. Proc. § 1845. We are not, therefore, confronted with a question of the weight of the evidence to sustain the finding, or of the admissibility of any kind of evidence. It is merely a difference between evidence and conversation.

The rule applicable is found in Great W. P. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 191 Cal. 724, 739, 218 P. 1009, 1015: "It is the amount actually devoted by the employee to such support that fixes the compensation. The amount, it would seem, must not only be contributed for support, but it must be actually applied wholly to that purpose." See, also, Owl Drug Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 71 Cal. App. 303, 307, 234 P. 921. In the record there is no evidence showing the amount contributed by the deceased for the support of these minors and there is no evidence showing that any particular sum was actually applied to that purpose. At the most we find inconsistent statements of what the amount contributed might have been and the witness' conjecture that these sums were used principally for the support of these minors. But, even so, the finding of the commission is far beyond the estimates of the witness and is inconsistent with the physical facts in evidence: That for many years the father had supported his entire family of six on an income estimated at from $100 to $140 a month, an average of less than $25 each; that the deceased was a migratory employee who had been out of employment for eighteen months; and that, at the time of his death he was earning approximately $150 a month. From these facts, and from other facts in evidence, it is apparent that the sum of $100 monthly was not necessary for the "support" of these two minors, and that, though the father may have used the moneys contributed by deceased "principally" for the support of the minors a large part of it was used either as a loan to himself or as an investment. That an award on such a basis cannot be sustained is the rule of Great Western Power Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra, and Owl Drug Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra.

It would serve no purpose to discuss the evidence on the issue of deceased's membership in the "family." The petitioner insists that the evidence merely shows that he was a "boarder" who made voluntary contributions to the support and comfort of the minors. On a rehearing this issue might be cleared by additional evidence.

The award is annulled, and the matter is remanded for further proceedings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Frank M. Miller was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals.

Affirmed in part, and reversed, with directions in part.

Kaye & Johnstone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

Following conviction by a jury upon a charge of manslaughter resulting from recklessly driving an automobile, and the denial of a motion for a new trial, the defendant asked for probation, which was also denied. He appealed from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

[1, 2] Appellant has minutely reviewed the evidence in his briefs, and, while it is stated therein that he entertains an "honest feeling that the evidence as it appears in the reporter's transcript will not support the verdict," this point is not seriously urged. There is direct evidence that he was driving his machine at the rate of about 50 miles per hour, that he collided with another automobile occupied by several persons, and that the impact fatally injured one of the latter. There was testimony tending to show that the defendant was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, but this is denied. An exhaustive recital of the evidence is not necessary, since the rule applicable to such cases is recognized by appellant that, where the evidence is contradictory, the jury are the sole judges of the credit to be given the various witnesses.

[3, 4] Numerous instances of colloquies between the trial court and defendant's counsel are criticized as improper, and are characterized as a "running debate throughout the trial." Considering the length of the trial, such instances were but momentary and infrequent. People v. Fritz, 54 Cal. App. 137, 201 P. 348, cited by appellant, is not controlling. It is admitted in the instant case that no single remark was seriously detrimental, and appellant has not attempted to indicate in what respect the remarks of the court were or could have been prejudicial to his interest. Hence they do not furnish ground for reversal. People v. Bruno, 49 Cal. App. 372, 193 P. 511. Remarks of the court which during its rulings add nothing to the force or effect of its action are not addressed to the jury, nor do they invade their province. People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 618, 45 P. 860; People v. Pera, 36 Cal. App. 292, 171 P. 1091.

An instruction consisting of four paragraphs was offered by the defendant, the first paragraph of which was given, and the others were refused. The court read to the jury the following:

"You are instructed that the law makes a defendant in a criminal action a competent witness, and you have no right to disregard his testimony on the ground alone that he is the defendant and stands charged with the commission of crime. The law allows him to testify in his own behalf, and you should fairly and impartially consider his testimony, applying the same rules as to weight and credibility as you apply to other witnesses, and if, after weighing all the evidence, including the testimony of the defendant, you have a reasonable doubt of his guilt, you should give him the benefit of such doubt and acquit him."

[5, 6] While the court may properly refuse an instruction which measures the defendant's testimony in accordance with that of other witnesses, it has been held not prejudicial error requiring a reversal. People v. Ridgeway, 89 Cal. App. 615, 265 P. 349. It is complained that the refusal of the remaining portions deprived the defendant of their curative effect by way of explanation of that portion which singled him out and directed attention to his testimony, even at his own request. The jury were expressly informed by other instructions that witnesses are presumed to speak the truth, and that they should not surrender their honest convictions concerning the effect or weight of evidence, upon full consideration of all of the evidence and of the strength or weakness of the testimony of all of the witnesses. The only omitted portion not elsewhere covered consisted of statements as to the object of the law in permitting a defendant to testify in his own behalf. It is sufficient that the trial court state what the law is without an exposition of its reasons. People v. Ramirez, 56 Cal. 533, 38 Am. Rep. 73; Id., 73 Cal. 403, 15 P. 33; People v. Piner, 11 Cal. App. 542, 105 P. 780.

Other points involve testimony which was given without objection as tending to impeach a defense witness, and examination of another witness, which ceased immediately upon objection by the defendant. Since there is no merit in these contentions, they do not require discussion.

[7] A motion for new trial having been denied, the defendant requested permission to file an application for probation, which was summarily denied. He challenges the power of the superior court to deny him the right to file, and to consider upon its merits, such application. The statute (Pen. Code, § 1203) expressly confers upon the court entire discretion in such cases, providing that it may summarily deny probation, or, if probation be not denied that the matter shall be referred to the proper authority for investigation and report for further consideration. However, in ruling upon the defendant's request, the judge expressed reasons therefor which we think clearly departed from fixed legal principles to an extent prejudicial to his substantial rights. In response to the motion it was said in part: "If a man wanted probation, he would come forward and show his good character and things that ordinarily are considered on probation, and have it inquired into before the trial. Then you would save the expense of a trial. This way of pleading not guilty and going before a jury and being convicted, and then coming forward and asking for probation, I don't much approve of. * * * There are cases in which probation could do some good, but it does not do any good to society to have everybody probated that is convicted, and it ought to be fixed so that probation is either granted or denied before trial, and obviate the trial, if the man is of such a character that he is entitled to be put on probation; not wait until after we have spent several days in the development of testimony and have the jury bring in a verdict of guilty and then have the judge set aside the verdict of the jury and tell them to go."

The language and reasoning in this proceeding was so nearly identical with previous rulings which have met with disapproval that the judgment must be reversed for the purposes hereinafter expressed. People v. Jones, 87 Cal. App. 482, 262 P. 361, 368; People v. Freithofer, 103 Cal. App. 165, 284 P. 484. In People v. Jones, supra, the Supreme Court upheld the decision of the District Court of Appeal under similar circumstances. As there said: "If the record is silent as to the grounds of the ruling, the presumption would be, under the general rule as to presumptions on appeal, that it was founded upon a consideration of the merits of defendant's application, but here there is an affirmative showing to the contrary. When the court undertakes to deal with the question whether a particular case or a particular defendant is within the scope of the probation law, then it is dealing with fixed legal principles, and a departure from those principles is an abuse of discretion and raises a question of law which may be reviewed on appeal." It must be observed that, since the amendment of 1929 to said section of the Penal Code, a defendant may ask probation and is entitled to like consideration "after the conviction by plea or verdict of guilty of a public offense."

The order denying a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is reversed, with directions that the defendant be again arraigned for judgment, the trial court to hear and determine on its merits the motion for permission to file an application for probation, and to proceed in such manner as may be in accordance with law and with its decision upon the matter of probation.

March 11, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 10, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 4, 1931.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑86.

Evidence showed that both vendor and purchasers had completely abandoned every covenant of contract except amount of price, and under such circumstances formal notice of rescission by purchasers was unnecessary.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑86.

Whether evidence showed that both parties abandoned contract of sale was largely question of fact.

3. Appeal and error 🔑931(4).

To support judgment for purchasers for return of payments, appellate court must infer that judge believed abandonment of contract by both parties was complete.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑338.

Where both parties abandon contract of sale, action as for moneys had and received is proper remedy for purchasers to recover payments.

5. Principal and agent 🔑184(1).

Vendor's agents rather than vendor held properly sued in purchasers' action for moneys had and received to recover payments under contract of sale, since agents had retained payments.

Under terms of contract in question, agents could not properly have surrendered purchasers' money before vendor delivered deed to agents in behalf of purchasers.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiffs commenced an action to recover a judgment for money. The defendants answered denying the allegations of the complaint. A trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The court made findings in favor of the plaintiffs, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the defendants have appealed.

The defendants assert that plaintiffs did business with them knowing that they were acting as agents of a disclosed principal. Continuing, they assert that any moneys they received were received for account of their principal and not for the account of the plaintiffs. On the first day of February, 1928, plaintiffs entered into a written agreement to purchase from the defendants as such agents a lot near the corner of Sixteenth avenue and Aloha street in San Francisco. The price was $9,250. At that time there was being constructed on the lot a dwelling. The record shows that at that time the Pacific Title & Trust Company held a trust deed dated January 13, 1928, to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $4,800. That mortgage was recorded January 14, 1928. It shows also that the same company as trustee held a trust deed dated January 9, 1928, to secure another note in the sum of $2,070. That instrument was recorded later on the same day. The plaintiffs paid down $100, which is acknowledged in the contract of purchase. The contract was signed by the purchaser and by the defendants as agents of the seller, and an approval in writing was signed by the owner. Among other passages contained in the contract are the following:

"Buyer to pay $500.00 down and the balance of the purchase price at $75.00 per month including interest at the rate of 6% on the first mortgage and at the rate of 7% on the balance * * * and $250.00 on or before February 21, 1929.

"Conditions of Sale: ten days from date of filing notice of completion are allowed the purchaser to examine the title to said property and to report in writing any valid objection thereto, to Ewers & Gorham at their office. If no such objection to title is reported, the balance of said purchase price shall be paid by said purchaser at the expiration of said time to said Ewers & Gorham for account of the seller, and said seller shall thereupon deliver to said office, a properly executed and acknowledged deed of grant, bargain and sale of said property."

Under the plain words used by the parties said contract provided that the sales price would be $9,250; that the purchasers were to pay $500 down and $250 on or before February 21, 1929. One interpretation of the contract is that, deducting the $500 payment, the seller would cause two mortgages to be placed on the property before the transfer was made, and that such mortgages would be in the total sum of $8,750, one bearing interest at 6 per cent. and one bearing interest at 7 per cent. and the purchasers covenanted to pay such "balance of the purchase price at $75 per month including interest at the rate of 6% on the first mortgage and at the rate of 7% on the balance," and on or before February 21, 1929, the purchasers would pay an additional sum of $250. Another interpretation is possible, and that is, if no objection to the title was made within ten days after notice of completion, then the balance of the purchase price ($8,500) shall be paid by said purchaser at the expiration of said time and $250 on February 21, 1929. But, under neither interpretation were the purchasers required to execute any mortgage or deed of trust. Now let us see what the parties did or failed to do. On May 8, 1928, the owner filed for record a notice of completion. Under the clear terms of the contract said notice started the time running within which the respective parties should have acted. There is no claim that the purchasers found any defect in the title or that they "* * * reported in writing any valid objection thereto. * * ". As they did not report any objections within ten days they were bound to have tendered the balance of the purchase price " * * at the expiration of said time * * *" to these defendants for the account of the seller, and the seller at the same time was bound to tender to these defendants for the purchaser a deed. Neither act was done by either party. On May 31, 1928, the purchasers paid $505.86 and executed a note for $3,700 and one for $250, and a trust deed to secure both notes. No part of the contract called for any one of these acts on said date. At the time the purchasers paid the $505.86 these defendants executed a document in which for our own purposes we have interpolated (a), (b), and (c). With such interpolations that instrument is as follows:

"Real Estate
"Ewers & Gorham
"1600 Taraval Street
"Phone Sunset 8300

"San Francisco, Calif. May 31st, 1928.

"Received from George McWhinney, the sum of $505.86, (a) to be disbursed as hereinbelow set forth, upon the receipt and recordation of a joint tenancy deed to the property as described in application 7693, of the Northern Counties Title Insurance Co., of San Francisco, vesting title to the said property in George A. McWhinney and Bernice McWhinney, his wife, as joint tenant, (b) subject to exceptions 1, 2 and 3, and 4 and a deed of trust in favor of Bernhard Kari and Lydia Kari for $3,950.00 only. (c) Interest on deed of trust set forth in exception 4, to be paid to June 1st, 1928. Said exceptions set forth in preliminary report dated May 22nd, 1928, covering the said property.

Balance on purchase	$400.00
Pro-rata of taxes to June 30th, 1928	1.26
Pro-rata of policy #24747 of the American Ins. Co. $2500.00—Premium $17.50—Expires 4/25/31	17.40
Pro-rata of Policy #24860 of the American Ins. Co.—$3000.00—Prem. $21.00—Expires 6/12/31	21.00
Recording deed and deed of trust	5.20
Notary fee	1.00
Title fee	60.00
	$505.86

"Ewers & Gorham
"George Gorham."

That instrument was not signed by the plaintiffs. In division (a) wherein it calls for a joint tenancy deed, said passage departed from the terms of the contract which called for a grant, bargain, and sale deed. Wherein in division (b) it provides for certain exceptions as against a marketable title, it violates the provisions of the contract which had no covenant as to exceptions. Wherein division (c) calls for the payment of pro rata charges of taxes and insurance computed as of the date June 30th, said passages departed from the terms of the contract which provided that such pro rata charges would run "from date of recordation of deed." On June 1, 1928, the purchasers took possession of the house and occupied it until September 27, 1928. Nothing contained in the contract authorized such an act. In the meantime mechanics' liens aggregating over $1,600 were filed. The plaintiffs offered testimony that they frequently asked these defendants to clear the title, presumably, of those liens, but it was not cleared.

After May 31, 1928, the owners' assignee visited the house and made the statement that the house in fact was not completed. As to whether the house was then completed according to the model (the house across the street) the record does not disclose. However, the record discloses that the owners' assignee took from that date until September 27, 1928, to do some alleged finishing work. Finally, on the date last stated the owners' grantee sent the plaintiffs a letter as follows:

"September 27, 1928.

"Mr. George A. McWhinney and Mrs. Bernice McWhinney, 2451—16th Avenue, San Francisco, Calif.

"Dear Sir and Madam: Please be advised that all papers necessary and proper for the closing of the deal relating to the purchase by you of the property at the above address are now in file with Northern Counties Title Insurance Company, 374 Bush Street, San Francisco, California—pursuant to the agreement entered into between you and Bernhard Kari under date of February 1, 1928. You will please call there and sign the two promissory notes—one for $250.00 payable February 21, 1929, and the other for $3750.00, payable $51.-00 monthly, each bearing interest at 7% per annum—together with the deed of trust securing same and the same will be completed in due course thereafter, as soon as the title can be run down to date to insure that the said deed of trust is a second lien, subordinate only to exceptions 1, 2, 3 and 4 in the current report of said title company. All other exceptions have been arranged to be removed upon notice that the above mentioned notes and deed of trust have been executed by you.

"Very truly yours,

"Henry F. Wrigley."

[1-4] On September 22, 1928, the plaintiffs vacated the house, surrendered the keys to these defendants, and made a formal demand on these defendants that their payments be returned to them. In this connection it should be stated that the record discloses the fact that these defendants never surrendered any part of the money which they had received either to the former owners or to Mr. Wrigley as assignee of such owners. From the foregoing facts we think it is clear that the instant case shows that both parties to the contract had completely abandoned it and had wholly departed from every covenant contained in it excepting the amount of the purchase price. Under such circumstances no formal notice of rescission was necessary. Bray v. Lowery, 163 Cal. 256, 261, 124 P. 1004; McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 404–405, 213 P. 36.

Whether the foregoing facts showed an abandonment by the parties was largely a question of fact. Fountain v. Semi-Tropic L. & W. Co., 99 Cal. 677, 683, 34 P. 497. In support of the judgment this court is bound to infer that the trial court was of the opinion that the abandonment was complete. Lemle v. Barry, 181 Cal. 6, 10, 183 P. 148. As there was an abandonment, it is settled law that an action as for moneys had and received was a proper remedy. 25 Cal. Jur. 738; Bray v. Lowery, supra.

[5] The defendants claim that the suit should have been brought against the owner and not against these defendants. They cite and rely on Bogart v. Crosby, etc., 80 Cal. 195, 22 P. 84. The case is not in point. In that case the money had been turned over. In this case it had not been turned over, and under the terms of the contract it would have been a breach thereof if the defendants had surrendered plaintiffs' moneys before they received a deed in behalf of the plaintiffs.

[6] During the trial the defendants attempted to show by oral testimony that the plaintiffs and the defendants agreed on May 31, 1928, that the deal should not be closed until the house was fully completed. The written contract could not be altered in that manner.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William Hazlett, Judge.

Action by Philip L. Wilson against J. A. Rosenkranz and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dana R. Weller, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

GRAY, Justice pro tem.

Vrena A. Rosenkranz gave to appellant, upon terms herein expressed, an exclusive option to purchase her real property "free and clear of encumbrance." After her failure to perform, upon the exercise of his option, appellant, alleging she acted in bad faith, sued to recover, under section 3306 of the Civil Code, "the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach." As J. A. Rosenkranz was joined as a party solely because of marriage, he will be eliminated from this discussion and Vrena A. Rosenkranz considered as the sole respondent.

[1] Appellant seeks a reversal of the judgment in favor of respondent because of (1) the alleged erroneous admission of testimony as to conversations between respondent and appellant's agent at and prior to the execution of the option, and (2) alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that respondent did not act in bad faith. Overruling appellant's objection that such testimony attempted to vary the terms of the written option, which obligated respondent to convey title "free and clear of encumbrance," the court admitted, solely on the issue of bad faith, testimony that, at and prior to the execution of the option, respondent informed appellant's agent that her property was incumbered by a deed of trust of which she was unable to obtain a reconveyance, and that the agent promised to obtain such reconveyance. Obviously, if respondent sought by this testimony to prove that she was not obligated to convey title "free and clear of encumbrance," but was only obligated to convey subject to the deed of trust, the objection would have been well taken (Civ. Code, § 1625; Code Civ. Proc. § 1856), but that was neither the purpose nor the effect of such testimony, since the respondent offered it solely on the issue of bad faith and the court expressly limited its reception to the offer. Respondent, by her answer and admission at the trial, conceded that the option correctly expressed the agreement of the parties. If her answer attempted to plead facts sufficient to entitle her to a reformation of the option, it was clearly insufficient for that purpose, nor did she by her theory of trial present such issue. The only issue here material, presented by the pleadings, was the question of her bad faith in failing to perform. As to that issue, the terms of the option are silent, and therefore the only evidence that could be presented would be as to matters outside of the option. In Johnson v. Schimpf, 197 Cal. 43, 239 P. 401, it was held that pleading of false representations, made by the seller prior to the execution of the agreement, as to the ownership of the property to be conveyed, sufficiently charged bad faith. If the purchaser can establish bad faith on the part of the seller by proof of the latter's false representations prior to the execution of the agreement, the seller should likewise be permitted to negative bad faith on her part by proof of false representations, made by the purchaser prior to the execution of the option.

[2-4] Appellant argues that the finding that respondent did not act in bad faith is not supported by the evidence because such evidence shows that the agent's promise to obtain the reconveyance was induced by respondent's false representation as to the extent of her liability under the deed of trust. An examination of the evidence as to respondent's statements as to her liability shows that they fall short of a fraudulent representation, because they were not made or understood as a positive statement of an existing fact, but were made as a guess by which the agent was not misled. This argument also is predicated upon a shifting of the burden of proof from the appellant to respondent. It was incumbent upon appellant to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, his affirmative allegation that respondent acted in bad faith. Yates v. James, 89 Cal. 474, 26 P. 1073. It is questionable whether respondent's refusal to convey as obligated

(which is all of appellant's proof on this issue) is sufficient to establish bad faith (opinion of Supreme Court in denying a hearing in Shaw v. Union Escrow, etc., Co., 53 Cal. App. 66, 200 P. 25). On the other hand, respondent's showing that the agent was informed as to the existence of the deed of trust (48 A. L. R. 12, 50), and that he promised to obtain a reconveyance (Hamaker v. Bryan, 178 Cal. 128, 172 P. 391), is sufficient to support that finding.

Finding no error as to matters urged by appellant, the judgment is affirmed.

LIBBY, McNEILL & LIBBY v. MARCEL CAFE et al.

Civ. 6468.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

March 13, 1931.

Corporations ⚷268(1).

In suit on account of stockholder's liability, allegation there were issued and outstanding specified number of shares was sufficient as allegation of number of shares subscribed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by Libby, McNeill & Libby against Marcel Café and Benjamin Fink and others. From the judgment, defendant Fink appeals.

Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles (T. L. Smart, of San Francisco, and Keith Bullitt, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

Benjamin Fink has appealed to this court from a judgment which was rendered against him in the lower court in an action which here may be considered as having been brought for the sole purpose of recovering a judgment against each of several named defendants on account of his liability as a stockholder in a corporation.

Regarding the liability of defendant Fink as such stockholder, the complaint in the action contained the following averment: "That during the times herein mentioned there were issued and outstanding six hundred seventy (670) shares of the capital stock of said Marcel Café and no more and that the defendant A. E. Brandstatter was on said dates the owner of three hundred (300) shares thereof and that the defendant Benjamin Fink was the owner of three hundred sixty (360) shares thereof."

The point presented by appellant as suggesting a sufficient reason for a reversal of the judgment is that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, and that the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment.

From an examination of the record herein it appears that the evidence adduced on the trial of the action clearly established the facts pleaded as hereinbefore set forth, excepting only as to the exact number of shares of stock actually owned by said defendant Fink; and, as to which latter fact, the judgment, as rendered, was amply supported by the evidence.

With reference to the point that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, specifically, it is contended by appellant that the allegation contained in the complaint that "there were issued, and outstanding 670 shares of the capital stock of said Marcel Café and no more" is insufficient as an allegation as to the number of shares of said corporation which were subscribed. Authorities cited by appellant in support of his contention are to the effect that in an action of the character of that here involved, the complaint must contain an allegation as to the number of shares of stock of the corporation which had been subscribed at the time the debt for which the stockholder is sued was incurred; and that "the averment that a certain number of shares were issued is not the equivalent of stating that only that number of shares were subscribed." Bidwell v. Babcock, 87 Cal. 29, 25 P. 752; Roebling's Sons Co. v. Butler, 112 Cal. 677, 45 P. 6; San Francisco Commercial Agency v. Miller, 4 Cal. App. 291, 87 P. 630.

Not to the contrary of the foregoing authorities, but more directly in point on the question at issue, is the case of Thomas v. Wentworth Hotel Co., 158 Cal. 275, 277, 278, 110 P. 942, 139 Am. St. Rep. 120. It is there held (syllabus): "In an averment that at the time the indebtedness was incurred, 'the total number of shares of the capital stock of the said defendant * * * then outstanding was thirty-five hundred,' though the word 'outstanding' is not the exact equivalent of 'subscribed,' and its use in the pleading is not to be commended, yet it is evident that the pleader was endeavoring to set forth the amount of the total subscribed stock, and that the form of the averment is merely imperfect or ambiguous. In the absence of any demurrer, general or special, the pleading should be treated, after trial and judgment, as a case of defective pleading, which may be waived, and not as an entire omission to plead a material fact, which is fatal." See, also, Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 40 P. 1047.

From such authorities, it becomes apparent in the instant case that the pleading to which exception is taken by appellant was sufficient.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action by C. F. Goodwin against the Farm Lands Investment Company, wherein F. W. Fawkes and Hiram C. Hubbard, as executors of the estate of C. F. Goodwin, deceased, were substituted as parties plaintiff. From a declaratory judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam and Harvey M. Parker, all of Pasadena, for respondents.

LAMBERSON, Justice pro tem.

The action is one to have declared and determined the rights of C. F. Goodwin, former plaintiff (for whom F. W. Fawkes and Hiram

C. Hubbard, as executors of the estate of C. F. Goodwin, deceased, have been substituted), as the owner of ten shares of the preferred capital stock of the defendant corporation, and to recover cumulative dividends thereon, amounting to the sum of $426.33.

The trial court found that the principal purpose for which the defendant corporation was organized was to buy, sell, and deal in real estate; that its articles of incorporation provide that the capital stock of the corporation should consist of five thousand shares of the par value of $100 each, forty-five hundred shares to be common stock and five hundred shares to be preferred stock; that the terms of the preference were set forth in the articles of incorporation, and were indorsed upon the certificate of stock which was issued to said C. F. Goodwin on or about April 2, 1912; that on or about April 2, 1915, said C. F. Goodwin received from the corporation cumulative yearly dividends upon his ten shares of stock for the preceding three years, but has received no other sum on account of dividends; that on the 8th day of June, 1921, the board of directors adopted a resolution authorizing the discontinuance of the business of the defendant, and the final dissolution of the corporation, and the division and distribution among the stockholders of its capital assets in accordance with their respective interests; that pursuant to said resolution the defendant thereafter caused application to be made to the commissioner of corporations of California for permission to divide and pay out of the capital stock of the corporation 100 per cent. of the par value of the preferred stock and 10 per cent. of the par value of the common stock; that on June 15, 1921, the commissioner of corporations issued a permit authorizing the defendant to distribute a portion of its capital assets among its stockholders, first, to the preferred stockholders as their interests should appear, and thereafter to the holders of the common stock as their interests should appear, subject to several conditions, among them being that no final distribution of the capital assets should be made unless and until dissolution proceedings had first been had, and a final decree entered therein under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure; that no indebtedness of said corporation should thereafter be created or permitted to exist in excess of the reasonable value of the then existing capital assets, and, further, that the consent in writing of holders of not less than two-thirds of the outstanding capital stock agreeing to the distribution of the capital assets must be filed with the state corporation department before the permit should become effective; that pursuant to said resolution and permit defendant paid to plaintiff Goodwin on May 12, 1922, the sum of $1,000, being the par value of his preferred stock, but that defendant has made no further payment, and has insisted that no additional payments can be made except out of profits and net earnings, and disclaims all further liability to said C. F. Goodwin on account of cumulative dividends; that defendant has distributed to the holders of common stock, dissolution dividends aggregating $53 per share, but that defendant is still possessed of property and assets which are more than sufficient to pay any and all dissolution dividends due to the holders of preferred stock under the terms of the preference clause.

The preference clause set forth in the articles of incorporation, so far as material here, was substantially as follows: That holders of preferred stock shall be entitled to receive, when and as declared, cumulative yearly dividends at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum in each and every year in preference and priority to any payment of dividends on common stock for such year; that the preference stock or any part thereof shall be subject to redemption at the option of the company at any time after January 1, 1916, at the price of $105 per share, plus the amount of dividends cumulative and unpaid thereon at the date of redemption. (Apparently no action was taken by the corporation to effect a redemption.) The preference agreement then provides as follows: "In case of dissolution or termination of the corporation, the preferred stock and the holders thereof, shall also be entitled to preference in the distribution of the assets and property of the corporation, and any and all such assets and property in case of such dissolution, shall be applied first, to the payment in full of the principal of the said preferred stock at par, with all cumulative dividends thereon, in preference or priority to any payment upon the common stock; and second, any balance remaining shall be divided equally per share among the holders of the common stock."

The trial court by its judgment decreed that said plaintiff, C. F. Goodwin, as the holder of the preferred capital stock of defendant, was entitled to receive and have paid and distributed to him upon and in connection with the liquidation of defendant, and out of the assets and property thereof, and in addition to the full principal par value, cumulative dividends thereon computed at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum upon the par value from April 2, 1915, to and including May 12, 1922, aggregating the sum of $426.33, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from May 12, 1922, to date of payment before any payment or distribution shall thereafter be made to any holder of common stock; that, prior to distribution of any portion of the assets of said corporation to holders of common stock, the corporation shall pay said sum of $426.33, with interest, out of the principal and assets belonging to said corporation.

Defendant appeals from the judgment and urges that, inasmuch as no profits were earned during the period covered by the failure of the corporation to declare or pay dividends upon the preferred stock, no dividends could have been declared, and that the directors are not empowered to distribute any sum other than the amount of the par value of the preferred capital stock. Furthermore, that the word "dividend" can only be construed in the light of its use in the statutes of California, and that the directors of the corporation must not make dividends except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof.

The complaint alleged that the defendant had realized profits on sales of lands, and that the lands held by the corporation had greatly increased in value, and that such profits were far in excess of expenses. The answer denied these allegations and alleged that between December 31, 1915, and December 31, 1922, there was a deficit each year between the resources and liabilities of the corporation. The court found that the allegations of the answer were not true, but there was no affirmative finding in regard to surplus or net profits during such years. In view of the conclusions which we shall announce, we regard the absence of such a finding as immaterial.

The evidence is amply sufficient to sustain the findings of the court that the corporation had, after the distribution of dissolution dividends aggregating $53 upon each share of the common stock, property and assets more than sufficient to pay any and all dividends due to the holders of the preferred stock under the terms and provisions of the preference clause.

Section 290 of the Civil Code authorizes the classification of the capital stock of corporations into preferred and common stock, and provides that the articles of incorporation shall state in clear and succinct manner the nature and extent of the preference granted, and, except as to the matters and things so stated, no distinction shall exist between said classes of stock or the owners thereof.

[1-4] The articles of incorporation create a contractual relation between the corporation and its various stockholders and between the stockholders themselves. Fundamentally, as to rights between themselves, the stockholders of a corporation may agree among themselves and enter into such contracts as are not in contravention of any law of the state, and as do not infringe upon the rights of the public or the creditors of the corporation to have its capital stock remain unimpaired. It is also fundamental in the law of corporations that the directors have no authority to declare a dividend upon any of its stock, common or preferred, unless the dividends are earned, and a corporation, therefore, cannot agree to pay annual dividends on preferred stock at all events without regard to the earnings of the corporation being sufficient to pay them.

[5, 6] The corporation is, however, free to contract as to the manner in which the property and assets of the corporation shall be distributed in the event of dissolution or liquidation. Section 309 of the Civil Code of California, as it read at the time of the incorporation of the appellant, recognized this condition in a provision as follows: "Nothing herein prohibits a division and distribution of the capital stock of any corporation which remains after the payment of all its debts, upon its dissolution, or the expiration of its term of existence."

This provision was repeated in later amendments of that section. There is nothing in the section in question which inhibits a contract providing for the distribution of the assets of the corporation in the event of dissolution or liquidation in the manner set forth in the articles of incorporation of appellant. Dominguez Land Corporation v. Daugherty, 196 Cal. 468, 238 P. 703.

The provisions of the preference agreement amount to nothing more than a plan for the division of the property of the corporation upon its dissolution, and the measure or standard of such division was the dividend rate fixed by the articles of incorporation to be paid to the owners of the preferred stock.

The object to be achieved in the issuance of preferred stock is ordinarily twofold. First, the investor is to be assured of a continued or periodical return, or dividend or dividends from the profits of the corporation without the uncertainty attendant upon the ownership of common stock; and, secondly, the investor is to be assured, as an additional inducement to invest, that in the event of dissolution and distribution of the assets of the corporation between the two classes of stockholders, if the anticipated profits have proved insufficient to produce such a dividend or return upon its capital stock, then he shall receive it upon such distribution of the capital assets in preference to any distribution to the holders of the common stock. Johnson v. Johnson & Briggs, Inc., 138 Va. 487, 122 S. E. 100, 102.

Such a plan is often used and plays a prominent part in the recognized business practice of the country. The plan is without value if cumulative dividends are to be paid only out of net earnings. In discussing the meaning of the terms "dividends" and "cumulative dividends," the court in the last-cited case, said:

"The contrary view unduly emphasizes the conceded fact that it is fundamental that capital cannot be impaired by the declaration of dividends out of the capital assets of a corporation, but they must be declared out of earnings, and hence that 'cumulative dividends' like other dividends must be always limited by such earnings to dividends which having been earned, the board of directors, in the exercise of a proper discretion, should have also declared. This view, however, apparently ignores the fact that when the capital assets are being finally distributed, this reason fails. As here used, the words 'cumulative' and 'accumulative' amplify the word 'dividends' and signify continuing growth in volume by periodical accretions. The word 'cumulative,' as commonly used in such contracts, refers to dividends which accumulate only because they have not been earned, or if earned, which have neither been declared nor paid. Cumulative dividends generally signify returns which gather volume by addition—delayed payments on account of anticipated dividends, which, although not presently earned, confer upon the stockholder the contractual right to require payment thereof in full out of future earnings before there can be any dividend on the common stock. Cumulative dividends in a going concern, under the provision here being considered, and generally, can only be declared out of earnings by the directors but not otherwise, because the capital cannot be thus impaired.

"What then results if the company dissolves, pays its debts, and then proposes to distribute its assets? Why allude to dividends at all in the provision for the distribution of the assets of the company, if it is intended only to include dividends which have been earned and declared? As to such profits so earned, no one would question that the holder of this preferred stock has a prior claim therefor in the distribution of the assets of the company over and above the common stock, upon which no dividend can be declared until after the dividends on the preferred stock have been first paid or provided for. The earning of such profits confers this preference. This being true, the references to unpaid cumulative dividends in the provisions for the distribution of the assets of the company are mere surplusage, if construed merely to secure dividends which have been earned. * * *

"There has, as it seems to us, been too much refinement of reasoning and literal construction in some of the cases. The case cited in the opinion of the arbitrator (Michael v. Cayey-Caguas Tobacco Co., 190 App. Div. 618, 180 N. Y. S. 532) supports the contrary view, and there have been several English cases which are cited in the extended note in 6 A. L. R. 822, with the same tendency, though the language slightly differs in each case. All agree, however, that the solution of the question depends upon the proper construction of the contract in the particular case. * * *"

[7] While there is some division of authority, and the question has not been passed upon by the courts of California, we are of the opinion that the weight of authority and sound reasoning is with the decision of the court in the case of Drewry-Hughes Co. v. Throckmorton, 120 Va. 859, 92 S. E. 818, in which it was held that a provision in a corporate charter and preferred stock certificate giving preferred stock cumulative dividends, and providing that in case of dissolution such stock should have a prior claim for its face value, and any arrears of dividends due and unpaid to it, gives a preferred claim for the face value of the preferred stock and cumulating dividends to the date of the corporation's dissolution, although such dividends may not have been earned. To the same effect are Westerfield-Bonte Co. v. Burnett, 176 Ky. 188, 195 S. W. 477; Johnson v. Johnson & Briggs, Inc., supra; National Bank v. Amoss, 144 Ga. 425, 87 S. E. 406, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 74; Page v. Whittenton Mfg. Co., 211 Mass. 424, 97 N. E. 1006.

Appellant places considerable reliance upon the case of Michael v. Cayey-Caguas Tobacco Co., 190 App. Div. 618, 180 N. Y. S. 532, 533, heretofore referred to. While the language of the opinion in that case supports the contrary view already referred to and is one of the leading authorities for such view, it should be noted that the preference clause under consideration in that case was materially different from the preference clause now under consideration. It read as follows: "The surplus assets and funds of the company shall be applied, first, to the payment in full par value of said preferred shares, and all accrued and unpaid dividends thereon." The distinction between that provision and the terms of the preference clause contained in appellant's articles of incorporation is obvious.

[8, 9] Appellant makes the point that the permit issued by the commissioner of corporations was invalid because not authorized by any statute in force at the time the permit was granted. Respondents' right to enforce their claims to preferred dividends was founded upon a contractual relation which was not invalid under the laws, and the corporation commissioner simply recognized the contract as a valid contract. The right of action was predicated upon the contract and not, as appellant contends, upon the permit. Having voluntarily made application to the commissioner, mistakenly or otherwise, and having assumed to act under such permit in the distribution of dissolution dividends, the appellant corporation cannot now be heard to say that the action of the corporation commissioner was without authority.

In the case of Burne v. Lee, 156 Cal. 221, at page 229, 104 P. 438, 442 the court said: "The very section of the Civil Code relied on by appellants (section 309) while prohibiting a division or distribution among the stockholders of any part of the capital stock, declares further that 'nothing herein prohibits a division or distribution of the capital stock of any corporation which remains after payment of all its debts upon its dissolution or the expiration of its term of existence.' As the owners of all the capital stock, and hence beneficially interested in all the property of the corporation after satisfaction of the claims of its creditors, the contracting parties may obtain a dissolution of the corporation, wind up all its affairs, dispose of its property, and, being entitled to the proceeds, be able to carry out the terms of the agreement. This would be one method of carrying out their contract; and, as it is a legal one, and one which it is possible to pursue, the contention of the appellant that the contract is in violation of the prohibitory legislation of the Civil Code is disposed of."

We are of the opinion that respondents are entitled to the declaratory relief decreed by the trial court, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Motion to dismiss appeal from conviction was filed on ground that appellant failed, within five days after notice of appeal, to file general statements of points relied on for appeal and request preparation of transcript as required by Rules of Judicial Council, rule 2, § 7. Appellant, by affidavit, made affirmative showing that within five days after notice of appeal necessary papers were prepared, order for transcript was signed by trial judge and that papers were delivered to clerk of court. In opposition, affidavit of clerk was filed, with attached transcript of register of actions showing appeal papers were not entered on register as filed.

LAMBERSON, Justice pro tem.

Motion to dismiss an appeal upon the ground that the appellant has not complied with the requirements of section 7 of rule II of the Rules of the Judicial Council promulgated for the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, which provides as follows: "Upon an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction or from an order denying his motion for a new trial, or from an order made after judgment, or upon an appeal by the People from an order granting a new trial, or from an order setting aside an indictment, information or accusation, or from an order made after judgment, the appellant must, within five days after giving notice of the appeal, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal shall be dismissed; provided, that the appeal shall not be dismissed for any defect in the statement of such grounds or points which does not affect the substantial rights of the respondent."

Judgment was pronounced October 25, 1930, and appellant on the same day gave oral notice of appeal. The record contained in the transcripts before the court fails to disclose that appellant filed any application to the trial court for a transcription of the phonographic reporter's notes, or a statement in general terms of the grounds of the appeal, or the points upon which the appellant relies, or what portion of the phonographic reporter's notes it would be necessary to have transcribed.

In opposition to the motion to dismiss, the appellant makes an affirmative showing by affidavits that, within five days after giving oral notice of appeal, appellant's attorney prepared an application for transcript on appeal and a statement of the points upon which appellant would rely upon appeal and designated the portions of the reporter's notes that the defendant desired to have transcribed as the record upon appeal, and also prepared and caused to be signed by the judge of the trial court an order for the transcription of the record upon appeal; that, immediately upon the signing of said order by the judge of the trial court, affiant forthwith deposited said papers with and delivered them to the clerk of said trial court at his desk in the courtroom of said trial court for filing, and also for the purpose of advising the court reporter of the making of the order for said transcribing. The order in which these papers were presented is not important. The affidavit of the attorney for appellant further states that, upon receipt of the people's motion for dismissal, he investigated the records in the office of the county clerk to ascertain the whereabouts of the original papers, but has been unable to find them among the files of the office of the county clerk, and that he was informed that the papers had been turned over to the phonographic reporter who had reported the case, and that the same had been either mislaid or destroyed.

The affidavit of the phonographic reporter states that immediately after the giving of the oral notice of appeal he received a request for transcribing the proceedings, specifications of points to be relied upon, and the order of the court ordering the transcribing of the record upon appeal; that he definitely remembers receiving said papers on or about October 28, 1930, but finds that he has either mislaid or lost said record. The affidavit of the trial judge states that on the 28th day of October, 1930, the attorney for appellant prepared and presented to the trial judge for his signature a request for the preparation of transcript on appeal, a statement of points to be relied upon by appellant on appeal, together with an order for transcribing the record, and that said judge signed said order on said date.

In opposition to the affirmative showing made by the affidavits referred to, the respondent has filed the affidavit of the county clerk, to which there is attached a transcript of the register of actions, from which transcript it appears that the papers referred to were not entered upon the register of actions as filed, and the county clerk states in his affidavit that the transcript is a complete list of all papers filed in his office.

In numerous cases it has been held that a dismissal is mandatory when the appellant has failed to comply with the provisions of the rule cited above. People v. Davis, 103 Cal. App. 318, 284 P. 516; People v. Riga, 104 Cal. App. 477, 285 P. 1069.

[1] A filing of papers is accomplished by depositing with the proper officer at his office or at any place at which he is called upon to perform his duties the paper which is to be filed. Very frequently, and as a matter of common practice, papers are filed with the clerk in the courtroom or in the judge's chambers, as well as at the principal office of the county clerk.

[2, 3] The county clerk is ex officio clerk of the superior court. Pol. Code, § 4152. It is his duty to take charge of and safely keep all papers and records which may be filed or deposited in his office, and also to act as clerk of the superior court and attend each session thereof and upon the judge at chambers when required. Pol. Code, § 4178. A deputy county clerk is ex officio clerk of the superior court. (People v. Collins, 6 Cal. App. 492, 92 P. 513), and as such has authority coextensive with that of his principal in the performance of his duties (Touchard v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150, 81 Am. Dec. 108). It is the rule that, where it is the duty of the clerk to file certain papers when they are delivered to him to be filed, his failure to do so does not forfeit any right of the party offering the paper for filing. Beck v. Pasadena Lake Vineyard Land & Water Co., 130 Cal. 50, 62 P. 219; W. H. Marston Co. v. Kochritz, 80 Cal. App. 352, 251 P. 959.

[4] The statement contained in the affidavit of the county clerk, to which was attached a transcript of the register of actions, is negative in character, and we are of the opinion that, in the absence of a positive contrary showing, the affirmative statements contained in the affidavits presented on behalf of appellant must prevail, and that the circumstances are such as to take the case out of the rule announced in the case first cited.

The ends of justice will be best subserved by denying the motion to dismiss the appeal, and it is so ordered.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from an order purporting to modify a decree of divorce in so far as said decree provided for the payment of alimony by the defendant to plaintiff. The facts are not disputed. Plaintiff had obtained an interlocutory decree which provided that defendant pay to her a certain sum monthly for a period of two years and a less sum thereafter until further order of the court. A year having elapsed from the entry of the said interlocutory decree, there was duly made and entered the final decree of divorce in which the prior order with reference to alimony and support was continued in force. Subsequent to the entry of the final decree, and on January 9, 1928, the plaintiff remarried a person other than the defendant, and since her said marriage was at all times living with her husband. On March 31, 1928, appellant filed in the court below a notice of motion for an order modifying the decree by striking therefrom the portion thereof providing for payments for the support and maintenance of plaintiff. The facts were not disputed. The remarriage was conceded, having taken place in the state of New York on the date alleged. In view of the place of marriage, it sufficiently appeared that appellant's application was timely made. It is further undisputed that there were no children of the former marriage. The motion, coming on regularly to be heard, was submitted on the affidavits of the appellant and the affidavit of respondent's counsel, which latter affidavit, as hereinafter noted, set up no facts other than those supporting the contention of affiant that the purported alimony provisions were in fact intended as a property settlement. After hearing, the court entered its order as follows: "It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the previous order of this court contained in the interlocutory judgment of divorce be and the same is hereby modified in the following particulars: From and after the 26th day of April, 1928, the defendant shall not be required to pay the plaintiff any further sums of money for her support and maintenance pending the further order of this court."

It is appellant's claim that the order should have provided that such payments cease as of the date of the remarriage, rather than as of the date the order was made; hence the appeal.

[1] As will be seen, the main question presented is as to the power of a court to enforce or order payments for the support and maintenance of a divorced wife after her remarriage. The general principle is announced in California Jurisprudence, volume 1 at page 1039. There it is stated in substance: The duty of the divorced husband towards his former wife is to support her while she remains single or until she dies, and, if she remarries again, or if she dies, that duty towards her will terminate. Good public policy would not compel a divorced husband to support his former wife after she has become another man's wife, except under extraordinary conditions, which she should be required to prove. The rule thus announced is amply supported by authority both in this state and in other jurisdictions throughout the United States. In the case of Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 P. 267, 270, 11 Ann. Cas. 520, the rule is discussed at great length and many authorities cited in support thereof. The court, in that case, uses the following language: "We believe that the cases wherein the alimony should be continued after the remarriage are extremely rare and exceptional, particularly where there are no children of the former marriage. Good public policy would not compel a divorced husband to support his former wife after she has become another man's wife, except under extraordinary conditions, which she should be required to prove. Unless such conditions are shown by her to exist, the court should, on the former husband's motion, cancel all payments accruing after the remarriage, in all cases where, as here, there are no children and the allowance is based solely upon the husband's probable earning capacity, or upon his breach of the marriage vows, and not upon existing property rights."

There seems to be little dispute between the parties to this appeal on the principle of law involved. However, respondent makes a number of contentions in support of the order in this particular matter. Respondent contends that the original order for the payments in question was intended, not as alimony or by way of support as such, but that it was in the nature of a settlement of property rights of the parties. It might be conceded that, if this were true, the rule announced would not apply. At the hearing on the motion to modify, respondent offered the affidavit of her counsel in support of this contention. Appellant offered cross-affidavits, and thus issue was joined. There were no findings on the question, nor is it the practice or custom or requirement that specific findings be prepared on orders of this nature. However, the order itself may be and is construed as a finding on that issue. Presuming, as we must, the regularity of the proceeding, it is apparent from the order that the finding of the court below was contrary to respondent's contention. Had the court found the provisions for support to have been in fact by way of property settlement then the said provisions could not have been disturbed, and the order here appealed from on its face does disclose that no such finding could have been made. Without further discussion on this point, we might add that the question is of no import in view of the conclusion we have reached on the main question presented. And further, the earnestness of respondent might be questioned when it appears that she insists that the order appealed from be upheld notwithstanding the same deprives her of a sum of money many times larger than the few months' payments involved in the period between her remarriage and the date of the order. As the order will be reversed, the court below will be at liberty to make further inquiry on this point.

[2, 3] Next, respondent urges that the appellant is not aggrieved by the order inasmuch as the notice of motion to modify and the motion made pursuant thereto both expressly contemplated the cessation of future payments, and that the order responded fully to the motion. This is too narrow a view. When the court below was appropriately advised of the fact of remarriage and the demand for modification of the prior order, its action was not restricted to the prayer of the moving party, but it was the court's discretion to make such order in the premises as the law and the facts required. Respondent then further presents a number of arguments all going more to the invalidity of the order and lack of power in the court to make the same, but still insisting that it be affirmed. It is needless to catalog these contentions. If we should accept all of the respondent's contentions we would be in the anomalous position of affirming an order on the theory that it should not have been made and was of no effect. The sole effect of the order is that it requires the appellant to pay for the support and maintenance of his divorced wife following her remarriage to another. This, as we have seen, violates a sound principle of law and is against a recognized public policy. This much is conceded, and it would be a strange judicial procedure for a reviewing court to sanction and affirm such an order merely because of some claimed irregularity in its entry.

The order appealed from is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a decree settling and fixing the inheritance tax in the estate of Margaret M. Clampitt, deceased, at the sum of $54,830.64. The basic reason for the appeal is the inclusion in the estate as property upon which the tax is computed, of certain properties which it is claimed by appellants passed by deeds executed by Margaret Clampitt in her lifetime to her two children. The contention of respondent is that title did not pass because there was no delivery of the deeds; there being absent from the act of handing the deeds to a third party an intent on the part of Margaret Clampitt to divest herself of title. The trial court found that the deeds were not nor was an assignment of an oil lease delivered, and that they were made without a valuable or adequate consideration. The fundamental contention of appellants is that these findings are not supported by the evidence; hence we are under the necessity of setting forth the testimony.

It appears that the husband of Margaret M. Clampitt and the father of Leah and Barbara Clampitt died September 26, 1919, leaving a will in which he left his estate one-third to his wife and one-third to each of the children, with the proviso that the share of each child should be held in trust by the mother until the daughters should attain the age of 21 years. It transpired that all of the property was community, and upon distribution the decree distributed four-sixths to the widow and one-sixth to each daughter. For several years prior to the execution of the deeds in question and with several persons, Mrs. Clampitt had discussed the distribution of her husband's estate, saying that it did not carry out his intention, or, to put it in words used by a witness, "that in her opinion Mr. Clampitt intended that the Clampitt estate should be divided equally between the two daughters and herself, and the decree of distribution didn't follow out that intention for the reason the community property law interfered with his intention and she wanted to carry out that intention." She talked to her attorney about it on different occasions and also to the manager of the E. A. Clampitt Company and to the auditor, to the last of whom she said: "When I get ready to transfer I am going to telephone you." In accordance with that statement she telephoned Mr. Frederick Hoereth some time in August, 1926, asking him to take certain old deeds, seventeen or eighteen in number, to the office of Mr. Prudhon, her attorney, for the purpose of having deeds drawn to transfer the property to her two daughters. Mr. Prudhon was absent on vacation at the time, but one of his associates took the instructions and prepared the deeds. On Mr. Prudhon's return he found the deeds, checked them over with Mr. Johnson, manager of the Clampitt Company, and instructed him to take them to Mrs. Clampitt for her approval and say to her that he (Prudhon) would be out later for the purpose of taking her acknowledgments to the deeds. On September 4th Prudhon called on Mrs. Clampitt, where she acknowledged her signatures to the deeds. He then took the deeds to his office, where he affixed his own signature and notarial seal. On the day following he returned them to Mrs. Clampitt and advised her to have Mr. Johnson, who, as we have said before, was the manager of the Clampitt Company, record them. Pursuant to her attorney's advice, Mrs. Clampitt took the deeds to Mr. Johnson's home and told him to have them recorded. Johnson's own words succinctly state what happened thereafter. He said: "Took the deeds with me and I went by the office and found I had to go to Bakersfield for a few days and I put them in the safe. Didn't have time to stop to have them recorded that day, and when I came back I didn't think but what I had them recorded; put them in a safe that we didn't use every day and didn't run onto them." The company had three safes, one of which was used for deeds and such records, and it was the receptacle for the instruments in question. They were not found or removed therefrom until about a week after Mrs. Clampitt's death. Subsequent to the execution of the deeds, the Clampitt Company was incorporated, and, though respondent's attorneys attempt to argue that Mrs. Clampitt exercised dominion over the property after the execution of the deeds, from the fact that she received four-sixths of the capital stock, the fact remains that the undisputed evidence shows that none of the property involved in the problem before us was turned in to the corporation—its assets consisting of that which was formerly owned by E. A. Clampitt under the designation of the E. A. Clampitt Company. Mr. Johnson collected the income from the property (most of it not being income producing), and remitted to Mrs. Clampitt therefor, together with any profits from the Clampitt Company. Mrs. Clampitt herself made the division of the moneys to herself and the children. One bank account with a balance of $64,200 in the name of Margaret M. Clampitt bore this notation in her own handwriting: "This money for Leah and Barbara, one-half already theirs." Another note on another account read: "One-half or two thirds of this amount belongs to the girls." Still another was opened in the name of Barbara H. Clampitt by Mrs. E. A. Clampitt, trustee, and a fourth and fifth, Margaret M. Clampitt, trustee, for Leah M. Clampitt and Barbara H. Clampitt, minors. And on August 11, 1927, a sixth was opened in the name of Mrs. E. A. Clampitt and Leah M. Clampitt. Mrs. Clampitt died September 18, 1928, at which time Leah Clampitt was 20 years of age and Barbara was 16. It should be added that in September, 1926, she was apparently in the best of health. Also it should be noted that the property which was deeded to the daughters made about an equal division of the entire estate between the three, or, in other words, accomplished what Mrs. Clampitt declared her desire to be to divide the estate into three parts in accordance with her understanding of the will of her husband. No testimony was adduced by respondent in opposition to that of objectors, which we have already summarized.

Reduced to their fundamentals, all the contentions of respondent amount to this: That the evidence does not disclose an intent on the part of Mrs. Clampitt to effect a change of ownership. It is argued that the evidence is in such state that the following language from the case of Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 P. 1, 3, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703, when applied here, establishes that there was no delivery: "It is essential to the validity of a transfer of real property that there be a delivery of the conveyance with intent to transfer the title, and the true test under which delivery is to be determined is in ascertaining whether in parting with the possession of the conveyance the grantor intended thereby to divest himself of title. If he did, there was an effective delivery of the deed. If not, there was no delivery. The solution of this question is grounded entirely on the intention of the grantor, and this essential matter of intention is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court from a consideration of all the evidence in a given case bearing upon the question. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 451, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186, 33 P. 338; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 73 P. 803; Estate of Cornelius, 151 Cal. 552, 91 P. 329; Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 757, 112 P. 544." We are unable to agree with the contention of respondent, and the unsoundness of the position may be very shortly demonstrated. Let us suppose that Mr. Johnson had followed his instruction and recorded the deeds instead of leaving for Bakersfield to care for other matters and forgetting them, could it be seriously argued that the essential intent on the part of Mrs. Clampitt was lacking? We think not. There was a compelling reason in her mind to effect such a conveyance—expressed to her friends, her lawyer, and the business manager of the concern in which she was heavily interested. Her purpose was further made manifest by the very execution of the deeds, and the instruction of her attorney to have Mr. Johnson record them was complied with so far as she was able to do so. There is no evidence that Mrs. Clampitt exercised or attempted to exercise any dominion over the property after the manual delivery of the deeds to Johnson. There is no suggestion in the record that she was attempting to carry out a testamentary scheme to avoid probate or collateral inheritance taxes. In truth, the fact that she was in good health and retained one-third of the property in her own name repels such an inference. The only circumstance upon which the finding could have been made is from the inference which might be drawn from the failure to record. But this inference must disappear in the face of the positive testimony of the witness Johnson, which is diametrically opposed thereto. We have nothing left then but a suspicion, a conjectural hypothesis that Johnson's explanation is not in fact the true one. Such a foundation is insufficient to support the findings.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the trial court to omit from the property upon which the tax is computed the real estate deeded by Mrs. Clampitt to Leah and Barbara Clampitt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter E. Desmond, Judge.

Action by Hilda B. Jenkins against the Bankers' Life Company, in which Hazel Stowall Jenkins was substituted as defendant and filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and the substituted defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This action is one to determine conflicting claims to the benefits of a life insurance policy. Judgment in the court below was for the plaintiff. The policy in question was one issued by the Bankers' Life Company, a corporation, and according to the terms thereof a certain amount of money was to be paid to the named beneficiary upon the death of the insured, one John J. Jenkins. It is unnecessary to detail the original pleadings. Suffice it to state that the action was commenced against the insurance company and that this company thereafter deposited in court the full amount due under the policy, whereupon Hazel Stowall Jenkins was substituted as defendant and the company discharged from any further claim or liability and dismissed from the case. Therefore all questions affecting the said policy as between the insurer and the insured or his beneficiaries are not within the scope of the present appeal. The only question is as to which of the parties here is entitled to recover the amount now deposited in court. It might be further noted that the defendant Hazel Stowall Jenkins appears and urges her right in several capacities, namely, as the surviving wife of the insured, admittedly deceased, and as the executrix of the estate of said deceased spouse, and finally as the sole legatee under the will of the decedent, which said will is duly of probate. It might also be noted, merely by way of completing the record, that the issues between the parties are joined not only by the original complaint and answer, but also through a cross-complaint and answer thereto; the result of the pleadings being to assert the claims of both parties in the various capacities under which they or either of them claim. Inasmuch as both parties claim, to some extent, by virtue of marriage, and the plaintiff was the first wife of the decedent and the defendant the second, we will, with this fact in mind, and in order to avoid confusion, not make reference to the parties as the first or the second wife, but refer to each merely as plaintiff and defendant.

[1, 2] Plaintiff and John Jenkins were married in the year 1896, and were husband and wife on the 30th day of April, 1913, on which latter date the policy of insurance was issued. The policy by its terms obligates the insurance company to pay the sum named therein on receipt of due proof of death of John J. Jenkins, if such death occurs prior to the 30th day of April, 1939, and while this policy is still in force to Hilda B. Jenkins, wife of the insured, if living; otherwise as hereinafter designated, with the right of the insured to change the beneficiary. Thereafter marital difficulties arose between the spouses and on December 13, 1924, a final decree of divorce was entered between the parties; antedating this was the interlocutory decree of divorce entered December 12, 1923. Within a day after the entry of the said final decree, John J. Jenkins and the defendant Hazel Stowall Jenkins, intermarried and on February 3, 1926, the date of the death of John J. Jenkins, the said parties were husband and wife and the said Hazel Jenkins is the surviving widow of said John Jenkins. At no time was the beneficiary changed in the policy of insurance; at the date of the death of the insured, the beneficiary remained as originally named, to wit, Hilda B. Jenkins, plaintiff. At this stage of the record we meet the first contention of the defendant, and it may properly be disposed of at the outset. Indeed, if defendant were correct in this contention, there would be little need of further discussion. The contention of the defendant is that, while the policy designates as the beneficiary of the proceeds thereof "Hilda B. Jenkins, wife of the assured, if living," yet the designation "wife" is as controlling as the designation "Hilda B. Jenkins," and that therefore the person who was the wife of Mr. Jenkins at the time of his death, is the beneficiary named in the policy. Much authority is presented by defendant in support of this contention, and in many instances the language employed would give support to defendant's claim. It may be stated that such a rule is applied in many jurisdictions when dealing with insurance policies issued by benefit associations or fraternal orders, but the rule thus announced seems to be more one of construction of the by-laws or regulations governing the society or organization issuing the policy. And in those jurisdictions wherein this rule finds support there is a clear distinction made between policies of benefit or fraternal societies or organizations and policies issued by exclusively insurance corporations, or, as it is sometimes phrased, "old line companies." To the latter class of companies or policies by such companies the rule has no application. There is an exhaustive discussion of this entire subject to be found in 52 American Law Reports, commencing at page 381, in which will be found collected the authorities of many jurisdictions. The general rule is that a policy of life insurance or a designation of beneficiary valid in its inception, remains so, although the insurable interest or relationship of the beneficiary has ceased. And the authorities agree that the words "wife of the assured" as used in the policies such as the one before us are purely descriptive. As the case presented will involve numerous points, each demanding discussion, we will leave this branch of the case with citation of authority supporting the views announced; it being our conclusion that under the terms of the policy the plaintiff was clearly the beneficiary thereunder, designated as such by the insured and remaining as such to the time of the death of said insured. Illinois Life Ins. Co., 93 Kan. 193, 144 P. 257, L. R. A. 1915D, 134; Courtois v. Grand Lodge, etc., 135 Cal. 552, 67 P. 970, 87 Am. St. Rep. 137; Sheehan v. Butchers' etc., Ass'n, 142 Cal. 489, 496, 76 P. 238; Caldwell v. Grand Lodge, 148 Cal. 195, 198, 82 P. 781, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 653, 113 Am. St. Rep. 219, 7 Ann. Cas. 356.

[3] Defendant next contends that whatever rights plaintiff may have had or which she may now claim to the proceeds of the policy were lost by reason of a property rights agreement entered into between plaintiff and her then husband, John J. Jenkins, on August 31, 1922. It is admitted that on the date claimed an agreement purporting to settle forever the property rights of plaintiff and her husband was signed. In that agreement the husband was described as the first party and the plaintiff as the second party. The provision thereof to which defendant in the present action directs attention is as follows: "The second party does hereby release and relinquish forever all right, title, and interest and claim of any kind or nature whatsoever, including all the rights of inheritance, maintenance, and community interest which said party now has or may hereafter in any manner acquire in or to any property which shall be a part of the estate of the said party of the first part in the event of his death, whether the same be real or personal property, or the separate property of said first party, or property of any kind acquired by said first party in which said second party but for this agreement might now or hereafter have any interest." The plaintiff, as stated, conceding the execution of the agreement and the provision quoted, insists, however, that there be considered therewith another provision in the same agreement, which is as follows: "It is further understood and agreed that the party of the second part has entered into this contract upon the direct representation, upon which, in signing the contract she has acted, that the party of the first part has made a full and complete disclosure to her of any and all properties which he now, either directly or indirectly owns, as shown by a list of properties hereto attached and made a part hereof, and that the party of the second part shall not be bound by the terms of this contract in so far as any property which is not listed on said attached list." There is no dispute as to the contract containing this provision, and it is not disputed that there was attached to the agreement the list referred to. This list enumerates much personal property even to the extent of including club memberships and other contracts, but it contains no mention of any insurance policy or policies nor any general language that by indirection might refer to any policies of insurance. Little further need be said regarding the contract. It is too plain that this contract could have no effect upon the policy here in question or the rights of either plaintiff or the deceased husband therein. Defendant here claims that the contract assigned to the husband all of the rights of the plaintiff in the policy, and that from the date of the contract the policy and the proceeds thereof, actual or anticipated, became the separate property of the husband. The contract negatives any such claim. The contract specifically designated the property involved or affected thereby and excludes the policy. The effect of the restrictive clause is claimed to have been aborted by the fact that at the time of the execution of the contract both parties knew of the policy of insurance and that there was therefore no need of specifically mentioning it. This argument would be as effective to support the conclusion that mention of the policy was intentionally omitted. Just why any mention of the policy was not made would be purely speculative, inasmuch as the record is silent thereon. We must concede the fact that it was not mentioned or by reference included amongst the items or properties to which the waiver of plaintiff was restricted. In leaving this branch of the case we might note that, even if we concede all that defendant here claims, it would amount only to a waiver of the wife's community interest in the policy and the question of what community interest, as such, she may have had in the policy or the proceeds thereof will be hereinafter discussed.

[4] The next phase of discussion involves the divorce action between the plaintiff and John J. Jenkins. The judgment roll in the divorce proceedings was offered in evidence. This discloses that in the complaint of plaintiff she alleged that there was no community property and the judgment and decree following recited that the allegations of the complaint were true; in other words, the decree in divorce determined that there was no community property. Defendant then urges, under the authority of Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1, 8, 147 P. 1168, that, this judgment in divorce, having become final, determined that the policy of insurance was not community property. In the Brown Case the policy involved was of a different nature. There the proceeds were payable to the estate of the insured, and no question of gift was involved. The husband, Brown, was both the insured and the beneficiary, at least for practical purposes, in that his estate was the beneficiary. The rights of no third persons intervened until the death of Brown, whereupon the proceeds of the policy would go to his heirs. The effect of the decision was that this policy was the separate property of Brown, and that, by reason of the divorce judgment, the wife was estopped from claiming any community interest therein. We might concede the principle of the cited case and yet be far from a solution of the problem before us. The plaintiff here occupies a dual position. If the doctrine of the Brown Case is applied to its utmost, the extent of the holding would be that, by reason of the decree in the case of Jenkins v. Jenkins, the plaintiff lost any claim to community rights in the policy. But it is obvious that her claim here is not being asserted upon a basis of community right. We may here, to identify the reference hereinafter to be made, cite the case of New York Life Insurance Co. v. Bank of Italy, 60 Cal. App. 602, 214 P. 61. With that case in mind, and it is unnecessary to quote therefrom, let us assume that the facts in this instant case were just a little changed. Assuming, for instance, that Jenkins was carrying a policy of insurance upon his life, the proceeds of which were payable to his sister or to his mother, and the premiums were being paid out of community funds. Under the Bank of Italy Case the wife would have an interest in the proceeds of the policy to the extent of her community interest in the amounts paid as premiums. Applying the doctrine of the Brown Case and conceding that the decree divested her of any community right in the policy, we would then be compelled to determine what, if any, effect the decree would have upon the beneficiary. The obvious answer is that such a decree would have no effect whatsoever upon the principal contract or upon the beneficiary thereunder, other than releasing the community claim of the wife. And, upon analysis, the facts here present a case no different. Under the doctrine of the case of Blethen v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 198 Cal. 91, 243 P. 431, which, by the way, is an excellent treatise of the general principles covering the field of community interest in life insurance policies, proceeds of an insurance policy the premiums on which are paid from community funds are not arbitrarily classified as community property. If the husband procured a policy of insurance upon his own life, with the beneficiary a stranger to the community, and the premiums were paid from community funds, the beneficiary would, notwithstanding, be entitled to the amount of the policy, in the absence of any claim by the wife or if the wife had consented to the payments. From the Blethen Case it follows, and indeed is expressly decided, that, in the absence of a claim of community interest, the contract of insurance is valid and enforceable by the beneficiary under conditions such as we have here. Therefore, if we concede that Hilda Jenkins, the plaintiff, lost any and all community right that she may have had in the proceeds of the policy by reason of the decree in divorce, it means nothing more than that her right as a partner in the community to demand a proportionate share of the proceeds of the policy, regardless of who might be beneficiary, was lost. The effect would have been the same had there been no divorce and she had consented to the community disbursements at the outset. Going into perhaps exhaustive detail, if the decree of divorce had determined expressly that the policy in question was community property and apportioned equally all interest therein, the effect thereof would have been and could have been only on the policy or its proceeds as of the date of the decree in the absence of further order. The policy could have been sold and the then proceeds, if any, divided or, if it were carried through to the happening of the contingency upon which full payment would be made, the proceeds thereof would be divided proportionately to the community interest at the time of the decree. In no event would the policy or the contract of insurance evidenced thereby be held of no further effect or invalid for any purpose. The contract of insurance, if kept alive, would be subject to performance according to its terms, and the proceeds divisible according to the decree. The underlying theory of the Bank of Italy Case and the Blethen Case, both supra, is that, as between the beneficiary and the insured, the contract of insurance is in the nature of a gift, subjected to the general law that a husband, though in control of the community funds, cannot make a gift thereof without the consent of the wife. It is, however, settled law in this state that a transfer of community property by the husband to the wife is presumptively a gift and operates to vest the property thus given in the wife as her separate property. Pabst v. Shearer, 172 Cal. 239, 156 P. 466. It would then follow, though this point remains unnecessary to the decision herein, that the funds disbursed as premiums on the policy here in question having been community funds, under the cases cited each party had a right to one-half the proceeds. The husband having made a gift to the wife of his portion of those funds, then she alone would be entitled to the proceeds therefrom. That no misunderstanding result from the foregoing, it will be noted that the language is restricted to the policy in question, wherein the wife is the beneficiary. Where a stranger to the community was the beneficiary, obviously under this phase of the argument there would be no gift to the wife of the husband's community interest.

Keeping in mind these principles, the remaining questions are easy of solution. Adopting to the extreme the contentions of the defendant, we find this situation: John J. Jenkins, after the divorce, assumed the status of a single man, as far as his individual finances were involved. He had extant a policy of insurance upon his own life with Hilda Jenkins named therein as the beneficiary, legally competent as such, and reserving in himself the power of changing the said beneficiary, which power was never exercised. He continued payments upon the policy until his death at which time the right of the beneficiary, theretofore expectant, became vested. The defendant here as executrix and heir claims that under such conditions the proceeds of the policy became the property of the estate of the insured. A mere statement of the facts is a complete answer to the contention. To adopt such a theory would be to hold that policies of life insurance mean nothing and by such a holding the usefulness of life insurance would be at an end and this form of insurance would pass. Such a holding would necessarily mean that every insurance company would be restrained from paying out on any life insurance policy until a decree determining heirship had been entered or some other statutory mode of ascertaining the heirs had been pursued. The designation of beneficiary would mean nothing, and the beneficent objects of life insurance would be thwarted. Life insurance occupies a too important place in our national and economic life to be thus treated.

[5] There remains but one other point. As a final argument defendant contends that, after the marriage of the defendant and the decedent, approximately five quarterly premiums were paid, and that these payments were made out of the community funds of decedent and the defendant. The finding of the trial court is against this contention, and from the record sufficient is disclosed to support that finding, and nothing is presented sufficient to warrant our disturbing this determination of the fact. There was much from which it might be inferred that the payments were made during the last year from community funds, but the showing is not of a character which would compel an overthrow of a finding to the contrary. The decedent was shown to have been a man of much capital, with varied income producing interests. As president of different corporations he received a salary of some $1500 per month. From the date of his marriage with defendant it appears that these salary checks were deposited in a certain bank; that at the time of the marriage there was in said bank an amount in excess of the amounts paid out as premiums, and such excess was admittedly separate property. The evidence adduced upon which defendant seeks to have the finding upset shows that the premiums here involved were paid by check on this account. And likewise is there evidence purporting to show that after the marriage the old balance was dissipated in the payment of debts existing before the marriage. The evidence further disclosed that Jenkins had other bank accounts or at least one other bank account during the period of his marriage and showed further that during the time of the marriage that had come to him from admittedly separate funds a sum approximating $150,000 with other sources of income inferrable. It is not pointed out just what amount of money remained in the estate nor in the account at either or any bank as of the time of death. We have gone carefully into the transcript of the bank account and the evidence concerning deposits and withdrawals therefrom. The statement of account indicates that funds were deposited in the account referred to from sources not identified. Checking the items of the account carefully, the most that can be said is that these salary checks for personal services were deposited in the said account and that the premiums on the insurance policy were paid out of the same account. This alone will not overcome the trial court's finding. Obviously the account represents but one small phase of the decedent's business affairs and the question of community funds, embracing a short period of time, as in the instant case, is not one entirely of inference and presumption. From the entire record it was for the trial court to determine, as a matter of fact, whether or not the payments on premiums represented an outlay from the community funds of decedent and this defendant, and having found, as indicated, against the claim of defendant in this respect, we find nothing in the record that compels a contrary conclusion. The amount in this particular account at the time of the marriage was in excess of $800, and the amount expended as premiums is less than $300. The testimony of defendant is that the entire original sum was expended in the payment of personal debts existing before marriage. However, taking the figures as defendant presents them, we can see that at the date of Jenkins' marriage with the defendant he had in this account the sum of $993.73; the sum defendant claims was paid out in discharge of personal obligations previously contracted was $883.90. The date of the said marriage was December 13, 1924. The salary due Jenkins seems from the record to have been paid in two semimonthly installments and such was the course of payment throughout. Therefore, on December 15th, two days after the marriage, Jenkins had already earned his one-half month's salary of $750, and but two-fifteenths thereof would be community property. The account shows that on December 16th there was deposited therein the sum of $500. If defendant is correct in contending that this account was an account of salary earned, then we may likewise credit this first entry to that source. The rest then becomes a mere matter of calculation, from which it is evident that there was in said account, and as separate property of decedent, a sum more than sufficient to absorb the payments laid out as premiums, which amount was $259.80.

Defendant urges certain alleged errors in the admission of evidence. In view of what we have said, it becomes unnecessary to detail these claims. The evidence received in no event would have any bearing upon the rights of the parties hereunder.

The judgment is affirmed.

JENNINGS, J.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from the judgment of the trial court made and entered after it had granted the motion of defendant for a directed verdict at the conclusion of the trial wherein evidence on the part of both plaintiff and defendant had been presented. The action was one for the recovery of damages for the injuries sustained by plaintiff by reason of the alleged negligence of defendant in failing to provide a safe place in which to work and safe appliances for use by plaintiff, who was an employee of defendant.

At the time when the injury of which plaintiff complains was sustained by him, he was employed by the defendant in the capacity of head brakeman on a freight train operating between San Bernardino, Cal., and San Jacinto, Cal., and while he was engaged in unloading certain merchandise from a freight car of said train onto a station platform at March Field in the county of Riverside, Cal. The merchandise which at the time was being unloaded by plaintiff was merchandise which had been shipped from some point in the state of Oregon. For the purpose of conveniently unloading freight from trains of the defendant at the March Field depot two planks had been used. These planks were approximately 7 feet long, 6 inches wide, and 2 inches thick. The ends of the planks were placed on the depot platform and the other ends extended about 6 inches into the freight car from which freight was to be unloaded, thus making a sort of runway. The planks were so placed that there was a distance of not to exceed 2 feet between their inner edges. The plaintiff had on a number of occasions made use of these boards in unloading freight at the March Field depot. However, the evidence discloses that complaint had been made by plaintiff and the rear brakeman to the conductor of the train in regard to the use of the planks and that plaintiff had asked for a bridge. On the day on which plaintiff sustained his injuries, a piece of boiler plate approximately 4 feet long, 3 feet wide, and ½ inch thick, and weighing 75 pounds, was sent out by defendant to be placed on the planks. This boiler plate is generally referred to in the testimony of the witnesses as a steel apron. Plaintiff assisted in unloading it from the express car of the train onto the depot platform. This steel apron was then placed upon the two planks and it was at once apparent that it was not of sufficient length completely to cover over the aperture between the planks, and as it was finally placed, there remained an opening about 3 feet long and from 1½ to 2 feet wide at the ends of the planks near the depot platform. The testimony indicates that plaintiff thereupon objected to the use of the steel apron, declaring that he preferred to use the planks without the steel apron. The conductor, however, said that as long as the steel apron had been sent out they would use it, but that he would get another on the following day. Thereupon, the plaintiff procured a small merchandise truck from the depot and conducted it over the runway into the box car where it was loaded with about 250 to 300 pounds of merchandise. The plaintiff, walking backward, then pulled this truck so loaded, onto the runway and when the steel wheels of the truck came in contact with the steel apron the weight of the loaded truck shoved the plaintiff backward so that he fell in the aperture near the depot platform and sustained the injuries of which he complains.

The evidence discloses that at the time plaintiff was injured he was 28 years of age and had been employed on different railroads in various capacities for about 7½ years prior to his accepting employment with the defendant in the month of July, 1927.

[1-3] It is alleged in the first paragraph of plaintiff's complaint that the defendant is a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of Kansas and engaged in the operation of an interstate steam railroad between the cities of Chicago in the state of Illinois and Los Angeles in the state of California. In the second paragraph of the plaintiff's complaint it is alleged that on August 8, 1927, the date on which plaintiff was injured, he was transferring freight from a car containing interstate shipments onto the station platform of the defendant at March Field in the county of Riverside. Neither of these allegations is denied by defendant, and the record further discloses that at the time plaintiff was injured he was engaged in transferring merchandise shipped from some point in Oregon from a freight car of defendant onto the station platform at March Field. We have here, therefore, the case of an employee of a railroad engaged in interstate commerce, who at the time he was injured, was employed in interstate commerce. This state of facts brings the instant case squarely under the operation of the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 USCA §§ 51–59). And this act is the exclusive remedy, as was pointed out by the Supreme Court of California in the case of Hines v. Industrial Accident Commission, 184 Cal. 1, 192 P. 859, 14 A. L. R. 720.

Since the Federal Employers' Liability Act provides the exclusive remedy in a case of this character, the question of substantive liability is to be determined by the provisions of the act and federal decisions construing such provisions. That all state laws upon the subject of the employer's liability to the employee in interstate transportation by rail have been superseded by the federal act, since congress by its enactment took possession of the field of such liability, was unequivocally announced in the case of Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 S. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, 8 N. C. C. A. 834. Our own Supreme Court has likewise so declared in the case of Smithson v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 148, 162 P. 111, wherein numerous decisions of the United States Supreme Court were cited and it was clearly decided that in actions brought in the state courts under the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the decisions of the Supreme Court are controlling in the construction of the act. This was also the holding of the California Supreme Court in the case of Hines v. Industrial Acc. Com., 184 Cal. 1, 192 P. 859, 14 A. L. R. 720. The same conclusion was reached by the Appellate Court of California for the Second Appellate District in the case of Werner

v. Southern Pacific Co., 44 Cal. App. 76, 185 P. 1016. Authorities might be multiplied on this point, but perhaps it is nowhere more clearly stated than by the Supreme Court of Washington in the case of Bolch v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 90 Wash. 47, 155 P. 422, 426, wherein the court said: "We shall not review the many decisions of the state court cited by respondent, since in any event we are bound by the federal decisions, and especially the recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court upon the subject."

[4, 5] Having arrived at the conclusion that in the instant case the Federal Employers' Liability Act furnishes the exclusive remedy and that the question of substantive liability is to be determined by it and that we are bound by the construction placed upon its provisions by the federal courts, we shall next consider whether the trial court erred in granting respondent's motion for a directed verdict at the conclusion of the trial. The solution of this problem involves a determination of whether under the facts delineated in the record it may be said as a matter of law that the appellant assumed the risk of using the particular appliance which it is claimed was defective and through whose use appellant received the injuries of which he complains. For the purposes of this decision it may be assumed that the appliance was defective, in that the so-called steel apron was not of sufficient length entirely to cover over the aperture between the planks that were placed to form a sort of runway between the freight car and the depot platform; that an opening about 3 feet in length and not more than 2 feet in width remained near the depot platform; that appellant observed the defectiveness of the runway and objected to the use of the steel apron, declaring that he preferred to use the planks as had theretofore been done without the steel apron; that the conductor of the train, who was appellant's superior, stated that since the steel apron had been sent down it would be used, but that another apron would be provided on the following day. Under this state of the facts it is earnestly contended by appellant that he did not as a matter of law assume the risk of using the defective runway and that the trial court erred in refusing to submit to the jury the question of whether or not appellant had assumed the risk.

The rule of the common law with respect to the assumption of risks of employment is declared by Mr. Justice Pitney in the case of Arizona Copper Co. v. Hammer, 250 U. S. 400, 39 S. Ct. 553, 556, 63 L. Ed. 1058, 6 A. L. R. 1537, as follows:

"It is to be borne in mind that the matter of the assumption of the risks of employment and the consequences to flow therefrom has been regulated time out of mind by the common law, with occasional statutory modifications. The rule existing in the absence of statute, as usually enunciated, is that all consequences of risks inherent in the occupation and normally incident to it are assumed by the employee and afford no ground of action by him or those claiming under him, in the absence of negligence by the employer; and even risks arising from or increased by the failure of the employer to take the care that he ought to take for the employee's safety are assumed by the latter if he is aware of them or if they are so obvious that any ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances could not fail to observe and appreciate them; but if the employee, having become aware of a risk arising out of a defect attributable to the employer's negligence, makes complaint or objection and obtains a promise of reparation, the common law brings into play a new set of regulations requiring the employer to assume the risk under certain circumstances, the employee under others."

In support of this statement of the rule the court cites the case of Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 S. Ct. 635, at page 640, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, where it is said:

"When the employee does know of the defect, and appreciates the risk that is attributable to it, then if he continues in the employment without objection, or without obtaining from the employer or his representative an assurance that the defect will be remedied, the employee assumes the risk, even though it arise out of the master's breach of duty. If, however, there be a promise of reparation, then during such time as may be reasonably required for its performance, or until the particular time specified for its performance, the employee, relying upon the promise, does not assume the risk unless at least the danger be so imminent that no ordinarily prudent man under the circumstances would rely upon such promise."

It is the exception to or modification of the general rule providing that in those cases where there is a promise of reparation upon which the employee relies during such time as may be reasonably required for its performance upon which appellant relies and which he contends warrants a reversal of the judgment in the instant case.

In opposition to appellant's position, respondent contends that assuming that the record herein discloses clearly and unequivocally a promise of reparation by the employer and a reliance on such promise by the employee, nevertheless the appellant must fail in his appeal because the appliance of whose defectiveness he complains was a simple appliance with which he was entirely familiar and whose defects were patent and obvious to him. That he was aware of the defective condition of the runway can scarcely be said to be open to doubt inasmuch as the record discloses that appellant testified that he objected to the use of the steel apron, declaring that he preferred to use the planks without the apron.

It is to be borne in mind that not only was the device or appliance of whose defectiveness appellant complains a simple one, but that appellant was a man of at least 7½ years' experience in railroad work, a mature man, and that he had on a number of occasions utilized the two planks hereinabove described for the purpose of unloading freight at the place where he suffered the injuries of which he complains.

Taking all the facts and circumstances shown into consideration, it would appear to be a proper case for the application of the simple tool doctrine. As was said by the Supreme Court of Ohio in the case of McGill v. Cleveland & S. W. Traction Co., reported in 79 Ohio St. 203, 86 N. E. at page 989, 992, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 793, 128 Am. St. Rep. 705: "He was familiar with and appreciated its condition and defects, all of which were alike open to his observation and within his comprehension, and it would seem from the averments of his petition that he was so impressed by this defective and unsafe condition that he not only complained of the same to his foreman, but to the master mechanic as well. Plaintiff knew as well as the foreman, master mechanic, or master that said stepladder in its then condition could not be used with any assurance of safety, and, having such knowledge he must be held to have assumed the risk of its use. To hold the master liable to an employee, under such circumstances, for injuries resulting to the latter from the use of so simple an implement or tool as an ordinary stepladder would be to extend the rule of respondeat superior beyond its reasonable limit and to apply it as never intended." The efficacy of the simple tool doctrine has been recognized in the following cases: Marsh v. Chickering, 101 N. Y. 396, 5 N. E. 56; Meador v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry., 138 Ind. 290, 37 N. E. 721, 46 Am. St. Rep. 384; Corcoran v. Gas Light Co., 81 Wis. 191, 51 N. W. 328; Kistner v. American Steel Foundries, 233 Ill. 35, 84 N. E. 44; Gunning System v. Lapointe, 212 Ill. 274, 72 N. E. 393; G., C. & S. F. Ry. v. Brentford, 79 Tex. 619, 15 S. W. 561, 23 Am. St. Rep. 377; Brewer v. Tenn. Coal, Iron & Ry. Co., 97 Tenn. 615, 37 S. W. 549; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Kelton, 55 Ark. 483, 18 S. W. 933; McCormick Harvesting Machine Co. v. Casimir Wojciechowski, 111 Ill. App. 641; International Packing Co. v. Kasimir Kretowicz, 119 Ill. App. 488; Webster v. Nisbett, 205 Ill. 273, 68 N. E. 936; Ohio Valley Ry. Co. v. Copley, 159 Ky. 38, 166 S. W. 625; York v. Rockcastle River Ry. Co., 215 Ky. 11, 284 S. W. 79. In a number of these cases the facts respecting the defective appliance complained of bear a rather startling resemblance to the facts disclosed by the record in the instant case.

A number of California cases are cited by appellant as supporting his contention that the trial court in the instant case should have submitted to the jury the question of assumption of risk. These authorities deserve consideration. In Notthoff v. L. A. Gas & Electric Co., reported in 161 Cal. at page 93, 118 P. 436, the Supreme Court of California decided that the trial court erred in granting a nonsuit on the ground that no reasonable inference could be drawn by the jury from the evidence introduced at the trial by plaintiff that plaintiff, in complaining of the unsafe condition of the premises where he was working was doing so on his own behalf as well as on behalf of men working under his direction, the Supreme Court holding that under the state of the evidence, the question of whether his complaint was made on his own behalf as well as on behalf of the workmen was one of fact for the jury. The opinion of the court as reported does not indicate that the simple appliance doctrine was suggested and at no place in the decision is it mentioned or discussed. The case of Anderson v. Seropian, reported in 147 Cal. at page 201, 81 P. 521, was a case where a defective stamping machine was being operated by a young man, inexperienced in its operation, who notified his employer of the defectiveness of the machine, but continued to operate it, relying on the employer's promise to repair it. The Supreme Court held that the questions of whether the employee in continuing to operate the machine, under promise to repair, and incurring the risks incident thereto, was acting as a reasonable and prudent man would act and whether the employee's complaint was made and the employer's promise given by reason of fear of increased danger in the use of the machine and whether the employee was induced to remain in employment by reason of the promise to repair were questions of fact and were properly submitted to the jury by the trial court. At no place in the court's opinion is the simple tool doctrine considered and from the description of the machine contained in the reported opinion, it is hardly conceivable that it could be embraced in the rather close confines of the doctrine. In the case of McGuire v. Miller & Lux, Inc., reported in 178 Cal. at page 644, 174 P. 898, the plaintiff, 24 years of age, who had little experience with machinery, was employed by defendant as an oiler on a caterpillar tractor whose machinery was by the court stated to be rather intricate. Certain parts of the machinery of the tractor used in its lubrication became defective and their defective condition was called to the attention of the engineer in charge of the tractor by the plaintiff. The engineer agreed to repair the defective machinery as soon as he could get around to it. On the same day plaintiff, while attempting to clean the defective parts of the machinery, suffered injuries. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case, defendant moved for a nonsuit, which motion was denied, and the defendant declining to present any evidence, the case went to the jury, which returned a verdict for plaintiff. On appeal it was contended by the defendant, appellant, that the evidence presented by plaintiff showed him to have been guilty of such gross negligence as to have precluded recovery as a matter of law. The Supreme Court held that the question of plaintiff's negligence was, under the circumstances shown, a question of fact for the jury. Among the circumstances specifically mentioned by the court is the lack of experience of the plaintiff in respect to what is termed intricate machinery. It is therefore obvious that this case is one of intricate machinery operated by an inexperienced employee, a state of facts that left no possibility for the application of the simple tool doctrine which so far as appears was not suggested. The case of La Fleur v. M. A. Burns Lumber Co., 38 Cal. App. 279, 176 P. 58, is one wherein the machinery operated by the injured employee was complicated machinery characterized by the finding of the trial court as dangerous to operate. This finding of the trial court was said by the Appellate Court to have been abundantly supported by the testimony. This case therefore presented no facts which permitted the application of the simple tool doctrine. The case of Hawley v. L. A. Creamery Co., 16 Cal. App. 50, 116 P. 84, was one where the lines used by the driver of a milk wagon in guiding and checking the team of horses drawing the wagon were defective and the manager of the employer promised to repair them. Within two weeks after the promise to repair had been made and while it was still unfulfilled the employee was injured by reason of the defective lines parting and the team thereby becoming unmanageable. The Appellate Court sustained the finding of the trial court that the employer was negligent in failing to provide suitable and proper appliances. It would appear that the circumstances of this case might well have justified the application of the simple tool doctrine, but the record fails to disclose that it was presented for the consideration of either the trial or appellate courts. In Diehl v. Swett-Davenport Lumber Co., 14 Cal. App. 495, 112 P. 561, an employee operating a planing machine in a lumber mill slipped into a hole in a platform attached to the machine and sustained injuries. The evidence disclosed that the defect in the platform was known to the employer's superintendent, who promised to repair it. The Appellate Court held that the trial court was not in error in refusing to charge the jury that an employee may rely on a promise to repair only for so long a time as is reasonably necessary to accomplish the reparation, holding that the promise to repair was definite and referred to the completion of work in which employer was engaged from the time the promise to repair was made until the accident occurred. There was no suggestion of the simple tool doctrine and it is not adverted to or considered by the Appellate Court in its opinion.

We have reviewed at some length the California authorities cited by appellant because in some cases it may appear that the simple tool doctrine has been considered and rejected by our courts. Careful analysis of appellant's California authorities convinces us, however, that in those cases wherein the narrow limitations of the doctrine would have permitted its application, it has not been considered. It is true that in some jurisdictions the doctrine has been definitely rejected as is noted in 39 Corpus Juris p. 761, § 959, where the author states as follows: "Except in a limited number of jurisdictions, it is very generally held that a servant assumes the risk of injury from defects and dangers in what are commonly designated as simple tools and appliances." The courts of Missouri and North Carolina appear to have declined to apply the doctrine. The general rule of nonassumption of risk of defective appliances by an employee after a promise by the employer to repair is said by the author of Corpus Juris to have been held to have no application where the servant is engaged in common labor with tools or appliances of simple construction except in a limited number of decisions. 39 Cor. Jur., p. 790, § 988. Among the decisions cited by the author wherein the doctrine thus announced has been rejected appears the case of Brouseau v. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co., 158 Mich. 312, 122 N. W. 620, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1052, cited by appellant.

[6] This general rule that imposes upon an employee engaged in common and ordinary labor who, with full knowledge of the obvious defects of a simple appliance, the burden of assuming the risks incident to the use of such an appliance, even where the employer's attention has been called to the defects and he has promised to remedy them, would appear to be based upon sound public policy and a proper conception of the reciprocal duties of employer and employee.

[7, 8] With respect to the matter of the propriety of the trial court's granting a motion for a directed verdict the California rule in this regard appears to be stated correctly and comprehensively in the case of Bannister v. L. A. Ry. Corp. (a corp.), 203 Cal. 427, 429, 264 P. 756, 757, where it is said:

"The rule governing the power and propriety on the part of the trial judge in the matter of granting a nonsuit at the conclusion of the whole testimony in the case is clearly and correctly stated in the Matter of Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 155 P. 631, wherein it is declared to be the rule that the right of the court to direct a verdict and the right of the court to grant a nonsuit at the conclusion of the evidence in the case are absolutely the same, and that the court may grant such a nonsuit only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled and indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such verdict were given."

The action of the court in passing upon a motion for a directed verdict would seem to be a matter of practice governed by the rules of procedure in effect in the courts of the state where an action of this character is brought.

It is contended by respondent that appellant has not perfected his appeal herein for the reason that this notice of appeal states that he has appealed from the judgment of nonsuit in favor of defendant, whereas it appears that no such motion for nonsuit was made or argued, but that it does appear that a motion for a directed verdict was made by the respondent herein and was granted. It has been assumed in this decision that a proper appeal has been perfected and the determination of this question is not necessary to the decision on the merits of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

DAUCH v. GINSBURG et al.

Civ. 7748.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 9, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 8, 1931. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 4, 1931.

1. Mortgages ⇨151(1).

Mortgagee's rights as mortgagee dated from time of execution of mortgage, and not from time of separate advancements for building operations.

2. Estoppel ⇨119.

Estoppel is generally question of fact.

3. Estoppel ⇨116.

Burden of proving estoppel rests upon party relying upon it.

4. Fixtures ⇨20.

There was no estoppel in mortgagee's favor, where conditional seller of plumbing fixtures contracted for sale of fixtures after considerable money was advanced under mortgage and entire amount was advanced before plumbing fixtures were fully installed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3).

5. Fixtures ⇨35(3).

Whether plumbing fixtures installed in hotel building became part of realty held question of fact for trial court.

6. Fixtures ⇨35(2).

Evidence sustained court's finding that plumbing fixtures installed in hotel were personal property.

7. Fixtures ⇨5.

Necessity for use of article itself does not determine its character as personalty or realty.

8. Fixtures ⇨20.

Conditional sales contract retaining title to plumbing fixtures installed in hotel building held valid as against prior mortgage.

9. Fixtures ⇨20.

Title to plumbing fixtures being reserved in seller, they did not pass to mortgagee upon foreclosure sale because purchaser acquired only such title and interest as judgment debtor had.

10. Mortgages ⇨372(5).

Landlord having acquired no title to plumbing fixtures at mortgage foreclosure sale, it had no title in such fixtures to convey to lessee under lease.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for the recovery of personal property or for the value thereof in case delivery could not be had, together with damages for its unlawful detention. The cause was tried before the court without a jury and resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the return of the property or for the sum of $18,500 if the defendants could not make delivery. The defendants Standard Mortgage Corporation and Lincoln Investment Company alone appeal, upon typewritten transcripts.

On February 26, 1926, the defendants Ginsburg executed a promissory note secured by a deed of trust to the Lincoln Investment Company in the sum of $58,000. This security was second to a deed of trust in the sum of $175,000 held by the Mortgage Guarantee Company of Los Angeles, both loans being made for the purpose of enabling the Ginsburgs to erect an hotel building upon a tract of land located in Los Angeles: the value of the unimproved realty at that time being $90,000. On November 24, 1926, the defendants Ginsburg purchased the personal property described in plaintiff's complaint (consisting of plumbing fixtures) on a lease contract in writing, title being reserved to the plaintiff. By the terms of this contract these plumbing fixtures were so attached to the building by slip joint threaded unions and flanges that they could be easily removed from the premises without causing damage to the building, and the right to so remove was expressly reserved to the plaintiff by the terms of the lease contract. Installation of these fixtures commenced November 24, 1926, and was completed before February 24, 1927. The Standard Mortgage Corporation made its first advancement to the Ginsburgs under its loan on July 16, 1926, and by November 19 of that year had advanced a total sum of $46,740. After the execution of the lease contract with the plaintiff three additional advancements were made to the Ginsburgs: One on January 3, 1927, in the sum of $1,200; one on February 4, 1927, in the sum of $3,190; and another on the same date in the sum of $5,870. On November 10, 1927, the Standard Mortgage Corporation foreclosed the Ginsburg trust deed and purchased the property at the foreclosure sale. On January 16, 1928, it leased the premises to the Lincoln Investment Company for a period of fifteen years. On March 2, 1928, this action was commenced for the recovery of the plumbing fixtures, the complaint alleging their value to be $21,000. The defendants Standard Mortgage Corporation and Lincoln Investment Company filed general denials of the allegations in the complaint but set up no special or separate defenses.

On this appeal the appellants group their argument in two classifications: First, the priority of the rights of the Standard Mortgage Corporation under their deed of trust, and the rights of Dauch under his conditional sales contract; second, the validity of the conditional sales contract retaining title to personal property when the personal property has been installed in the hotel building as against innocent third parties without notice.

[1] The trial court found that the entire sum of $58,000 was advanced by the Standard Mortgage Corporation pursuant to the requirements of the building loan. The building loan was evidenced by a promissory note and a deed of trust for the full sum without any specifications as to the time or manner in which any portion of that sum was to be advanced by the mortgage corporation. Assuming that the obligation of the mortgage corporation was to make advancements as the building operations progressed, then these advancements were obligatory upon the mortgage corporation and its rights as a mortgagee dated from the time of the execution of the mortgage and not from the time of the separate advancements. 17 Cal. Jur. 898, 899. The mortgage corporation must, therefore, be treated as a prior mortgagee, that is, a mortgagee whose rights accrued prior to the sale and delivery of the personal property described in the plaintiff's complaint. This being so, the case differs from the case of Oakland Bank of Savings v. California Pressed Brick Co., 183 Cal. 295, 191 P. 524, where the Supreme Court held that title reserved by a conditional vendor is not good against a subsequent mortgagee without notice of the reserved title. The same rule is followed in Bell v. Mortgage Guarantee Co. (Cal. App.) 292 P. 660, under a similar set of facts. We find no authority in this state defining the rights of a prior mortgagee in relation to personal property going into the realty covered by the mortgage but where the vendor of the personalty has reserved title. Authorities from other jurisdictions are in conflict, with an equally respectable array on each side of the question.

[2-4] The real principle which is determinative of the rights of the parties, and which is the principle involved in the California cases above cited, is the principle of estoppel. But here the defense of estoppel was not pleaded nor proved nor found. The facts unquestionably are that the loan was made long prior to any sale or delivery of the plumbing fixtures. It was made for the purpose of enabling the Ginsburgs to construct the hotel, and no doubt the parties contemplated at the time that some plumbing fixtures would be necessary. But the very fact that the loans of the mortgage corporation were made as the building construction progressed was sufficient in itself to put the mortgage corporation on notice that the building cost must be paid for out of the loans advanced by the corporation. It therefore had every reason to exercise the precaution to see that these costs were paid in time and every opportunity to acquire knowledge of the method and time of payment. If, therefore, it did not have actual knowledge of the agreement made between the plaintiff and the Ginsburgs, it at least had the means of knowledge and every reason to be on notice as to the time and manner of payment. The facts are also undisputed that more than $46,000 was advanced by the mortgage corporation before any contract for the plumbing fixtures had been executed, and that the entire amount of the loan was advanced before these fixtures were fully installed. The definition of "estoppel" is found in subdivision 3, § 1962, Code of Civil Procedure, where it is declared that: "Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it." It is hardly necessary to say that estoppel is generally a question of fact and that the burden of proving it rests upon the party relying upon it. 10 Cal. Jur. § 31, p. 656. If the trial court had been asked to find on the question of estoppel upon the facts which appear in the record, it would have been compelled to find adversely to appellant; hence the point is not open to discussion on this appeal.

[5-7] Eliminating the question of estoppel, the inquiry resolves itself into whether the property described in plaintiff's complaint is personal property or whether, because of its affixture to the premises, it became a part of the realty. On this issue the trial court held that all this property could be detached and removed from the real property without any damage or injury to the realty, and that from the date of its sale, on November 24, 1926, it remained the personal property of the plaintiff. This, of course, was a question of fact which was squarely placed in issue. It is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court upon all the evidence, the intent of the parties often being a controlling factor. Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 3, 40 Am. Rep. 107; Gosliner v. Briones, 187 Cal. 557, 204 P. 19; Jahnke v. Jahnke, 81 Cal. App. 387, 253 P. 752. Our examination of the evidence convinces us that this finding of the trial court was amply sustained by the evidence. In fact, the only real attack made upon the evidence by the appellants is that these plumbing fixtures were necessary for the operation of the hotel as an hotel. The same may be said of beds, rugs, chairs, and other articles which are commonly used in the operation of an hotel. The necessity for the use of an article itself does not determine its character as personalty or realty.

[8-10] Such being the case, the rule applicable is clearly stated in Oakland Bank of Savings v. California Pressed Brick Co., 183 Cal. 295, 297, 191 P. 524, where the Supreme Court said: "The owner of personal property has the right to make an agreement to sell the same and deliver possession thereof to the buyer, upon the condition that the title thereto shall nevertheless remain in the seller until the price agreed on has been fully paid, and the title so withheld by the owner will until full payment, be superior to that of a subsequent mortgage or purchase of such personal property from the buyer, even if such subsequent mortgage or purchase was made without knowledge or notice of the reservation of title and paid full value for the property."

Thus, upon the second point raised by the appellants, the conditional sales contract retaining title to the personal property to the plaintiff was valid under the express rule announced in the Oakland Bank of Savings Case, because of the court's finding that this property was the personal property of the plaintiff and because there is not involved in this case, as in the cases cited, the doctrine of estoppel. This being so, the property of the plaintiff did not accrue to the mortgage corporation as additional security under its deed of trust, and the title being reserved in the plaintiff, it did not pass to the mortgage corporation upon the foreclosure sale, because upon this sale the purchaser acquired only such title and interest as the judgment debtor had. Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 3, 40 Am. Rep. 107; Jordan v. Myres, 126 Cal. 565, 567, 58 P. 1061. When the mortgage corporation purchased the realty at its own foreclosure sale, it did not acquire title to the personal property specified in plaintiff's complaint, and this being so, it had no title in the personalty to convey to the Lincoln Investment Company when it executed to the latter a lease of the hotel premises.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOATMAN v. PACIFIC READY-CUT HOMES, Inc., et al.

Civ. 7725.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 9, 1931.

1. Principal and surety 🔑59.

In bonds and undertakings, duty of performance is limited to terms of contract.

2. Principal and surety 🔑118.

Mortgagee could not recover upon builder's bond, conditioned that builder would comply with contract between builder and mortgagor who owned lot on which builder was erecting building, where builder fully complied with contract up to time of mortgagor's default.

3. Principal and surety ⚿118.

Where principal is discharged, surety likewise escapes liability.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by William Goatman against the Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., and another. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

L. C. Woods, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

The action results from a disagreement between the parties over the construction of the terms of a certain bond executed by defendant Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, as principal, and defendant Standard Accident Insurance Company, as surety, and plaintiff as obligee.

There is little, if any, dispute as to the facts and the due execution and delivery of the bond. The defendant Pacific Ready-Cut Homes Company, hereinafter called the builder, had entered into an agreement with one Lawrence Law by the terms of which the said company was to build upon a certain lot a building described as of the double stucco type. The said Lawrence Law was the owner of the lot upon which the said building was to be erected. After the work of construction had commenced, the said Law applied to the plaintiff Goatman for a loan, offering as security a mortgage on the lot together with the building to be erected. Plaintiff was willing to make the loan, as requested, but desired some further assurance or protection to the end that there would be no delay, cessation, or abandonment of the work of construction. Accordingly Goatman approached the builder and explained his situation and what he desired in the way of assurance of completion. Thereupon the matter of the bond was taken up and agreed upon as being the means of obtaining the end desired. Several forms of bond, at least three, were suggested and prepared, the third being the one found satisfactory and accepted. Before coming to the bond itself, and its terms, we might note the circumstances surrounding its delivery. No suggestion of fraud or mistake enters into the case. The plaintiff testifies that he accepted the bond, and that he was satisfied with its terms, and that, whatever is in the bond, he was, at the time of trial, still satisfied. This much, preliminarily, to indicate that the question to be determined narrows itself down to a construction of the terms of the bond and the liabilities arising therefrom.

Without detailing the facts which give to plaintiff a cause of action predicated upon the bond, it will suffice to say that, if the construction contended for by defendants and placed on the bond in the court below is the correct construction, then any further questions are immaterial. Continuing with the facts, it appears that the builder proceeded in the construction of the building. However, before the building was completed and at a stage far from completion, it developed that Lawrence Law was a fugitive from justice and he was taken into custody by local police authority. That thereupon Law defaulted in the terms of the building contract and abandoned the same entirely. Likewise the builder abandoned further construction, and its activities in that connection terminated. Plaintiff Goatman thereupon sought foreclosure, and, after carrying this proceeding to a sale, found the returns inadequate to satisfy the mortgage, and hence this action to recover on the bond.

The bond in dispute may now be considered. Under the terms thereof the principal and the surety are firmly bound unto the plaintiff in the sum of $5,600, and the condition of the bond is recited as follows: "Whereas the above bounden Principal has entered into a certain written contract with L. Law dated Febraury 28th, 1924, for the construction of a double stucco dwelling—four rooms to the side situate 7240-44 Hughes Ave., Los Angeles, California, which contract is hereby referred to and made a part hereof as fully and to the same extent as if copied at length herein. Now therefore the condition of the above obligation is such, that if the above bounden Principal shall well and truly keep, do and perform each and every, all and singular, the matters and things in said contract set forth and specified to be by the said Principal kept, done and performed at the time and in the manner in said contract specified, and shall pay over, make good and reimburse to the above named obligee all loss and damage said obligee may sustain by failure or default on the part of said Principal, then this obligation shall be void; otherwise to be and remain in full force and effect." The contention of the appellant is that the condition of this bond bound the builder to erect the building in question, irrespective of what the cocontracting Law might do or fail to do. In other words, that irrespective of any contract between Law and the builder, the latter were bounden to the plaintiff to carry the building to completion. We cannot so interpret the obligation. It was no doubt, the desire and demand of plaintiff that he be protected to an extent that would preclude Law absconding or abandoning the contract. This could easily have been accomplished by plaintiff taking over the contract in his own name, and, instead of advancing the money to Law, he could have withheld the same to be disbursed by himself as the building progressed. This he did not deem necessary. He went to the builder and required from a him a bond and surety to the effect, not that the builder would complete the construction of a building upon the lot, but that the builder would comply in every respect with the terms of the contract between the said builder and Law. The bond incorporated in full the contract between the builder and Law and limited the condition of the bond to that contract to the end that, if the builder should well and truly keep, do, and perform each and every, all and singular, the matters in said contract set forth and specified by the said principal to be done and performed at the time and in the manner in said contract specified, etc., then the obligation should be void. No matter how the words employed are construed or what liberality of construction may be indulged, we find ourselves tied to the limitations of the building contract.

[1] There is no dispute, and the trial court found that the builder fully performed in as far as it owed any duty to perform under the contract. The fact is, as found, that upon amply sufficient grounds the contract was rescinded by the builder and further performance excused. The trial court did expressly find as a matter of fact that the builder was excused from further performance; and (from other facts found upon sufficient evidence, not questioned here) it was the trial court's conclusion of law that performance was excused. We fail to find express authority covering any bond of the kind here before us. It is distinctly a private bond as distinguished from any undertaking provided for by statute. Parties have the right to contract in any legal manner desired, and there is nothing in a bond of this character that renders it unenforceable. However, there are many general principles applicable alike to any and all forms of undertakings. In bonds and undertakings, as in other forms of contract, the duty of performance is limited to the terms of the contract. Indeed, it may be said that in the case of bonds and undertakings the rule is more strictly enforced. The doctrine is announced in the case of W. P. Fuller & Co. v. Alturas S. Dist., 28 Cal. App. 609, 612, 153 P. 743, 745, as follows: "It is elementary that 'sureties are never bound beyond the strict letter of their contract; that they have a right to stand upon the precise terms of their agreement, and that there is no authority for extending their liability beyond the stipulation to which they have chosen to bind themselves.'" We may concede that this rule might relax in the face of compelling equities or that the appearance of fraud, misrepresentation, or undue advantage might compel such a construction as would meet the requirements of an even justice. None of these elements appears here.

It is true, likewise, that, where a bond or undertaking is a requirement of the law in order to give security against potential or threatened loss, the bond or undertaking would be construed with the purpose thereof always in mind, and the language employed would be subordinated to the result contemplated by the law. Again, this feature does not present itself here.

Surveying the situation it is apparent that the plaintiff had, within his own means, ample protection against any loss. The money he was to advance to Law was only to be advanced upon the security of the lot and the completed building, and the purpose of the advancement was to complete the construction of the said building. The plaintiff was in complete control of the funds to be advanced and all that he need do for complete protection was to have himself taken over the contract of Law and paid the sums direct to the builder as the building progressed. When he chose to advance the money to Law, regardless of the latter's use thereof and to accept as his protection the guaranty of the defendants that the contract would be performed on their behalf, it was at his own risk. It may here be noted that, when the builder contracted with Law, it took a trust deed upon the property as security for the performance of the contract on the part of Law. When plaintiff became the lender, then the defendants relinquished, for the purposes of the loan, its trust deed, and subordinated its claim of lien to the mortgage given by Law to the plaintiff. Thus it will be seen that the builder was at the complete mercy of plaintiff and Law with no assurance of protection other than that the advancements made by plaintiff to Law would be applied on the contract. Under these conditions there is no compelling equity demanding that the builder should be in the position of furnishing a building to plaintiff without payment, which would be the result of a construction of the bond such as plaintiff is contending for.

escapes liability. Stockton, etc., Society v. Giddings, 96 Cal. 84, 30 P. 1016, 21 L. R. A. 406, 31 Am. St. Rep. 181; Holden v. Mensinger, 175 Cal. 300, 165 P. 950; Civ. Code, § 2836, 2809; San Francisco T. Seminary v. Monterey County G. & E. Co., 179 Cal. 166, 175 P. 693.

JENNINGS, J.

Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment of the trial court denying an injunction.

Both appellants and respondents are appropriators of water from Kings river. Kings river is a natural water course having its source in the Sierra Nevada Mountains and flowing westerly and southwesterly through the Kings river alluvial fan. At a point approximately forty miles from the place where it leaves the foothills the river divides, one branch flowing in a southerly direction and the other flowing northwesterly through lands served by members of respondent Murphy Slough Association. At approximately the point where Kings river emerges from the foothills there is a government gauging station, also a gauge observer's station and various devices for measuring and rating the water of the stream. This point is called Piedra and the diversions from Kings river by all parties to the present action are downstream from Piedra. The diversions of appellants People's Ditch Company and Last Chance Water Ditch Company are upstream from the diversions of the respondent Murphy Slough Association and the diversion of appellant Lemoore Canal & Irrigation Company is downstream from the diversions of respondents. The distance from Piedra to the head of the ditch of the People's Ditch Company is approximately thirty-five miles. The diversion of the respondent Murphy Slough Association is approximately ten miles further downstream.

From time to time various efforts have been made by those having appropriative rights to the water of Kings river to allot the water of the stream among themselves. On May 3, 1927, an agreement entitled "Water Right Indenture" was entered into by the parties to the present action by which a monthly flow schedule establishing the quantity of water allotted to each party at the times specified was approved and adopted. On the same date, for the purpose of carrying into execution the plan and schedule of the "Water Right Indenture" an agreement entitled "Administrative Agreement" was executed by the parties to the former agreement. In both of these instruments, it is clearly and specifically stated that the respondent Foothill irrigation district had not theretofore diverted and appropriated water from Kings river, but that said Foothill irrigation district desired, if it could lawfully accomplish it, to become a diverter from the river.

On November 28, 1924, an agreement was entered into by the Murphy Slough Association and the Foothill irrigation district by which the association agreed that the irrigation district might enter upon Kings river at some convenient diversion point and take from the river such quantity of the water up to 250 second feet as the Murphy Slough Association should, during the term of the agreement, be entitled to divert therefrom subject to the right of the association to demand and receive all of the water in excess of 100 second feet; and the further right of the association to receive its total entitlement of water during the month of November in each year. In exchange for the river water thus proposed to be diverted by the Foothill irrigation district, the irrigation district agreed that it would acquire a certain tract of water bearing land in proximity to the intake of the Murphy Slough Association's canal and would bore wells and erect pumping plants thereon and would deliver to the Murphy Slough Association an amount of water pumped from such wells equal to the quantity that the irrigation district should divert from Kings river and 10 per cent. of such quantity in addition thereto. This agreement was throughout the trial referred to as the "Exchange Agreement." The evidence produced at the trial of the cause shows that the Foothill irrigation district proposed, in accordance with the provisions of the exchange agreement, to enter upon Kings river at a point called Avocado, upstream from the diversions of the appellants and distant approximately twenty-five miles from the head of the People's Ditch Company canal, and there to divert from Kings river such quantity of water as it should be entitled to take by virtue of its contract with the Murphy Slough Association. It is this proposed diversion which appellants sought by this action to prevent.

[1] At the conclusion of the trial, the court found specifically that the proposed diversion by the Foothill irrigation district might be made without injury to the appellants herein and rendered its judgment denying injunctive relief. Appellants contend that this finding of the trial court is not supported by the evidence. Upon this important phase of the case the evidence was in direct conflict, but a careful examination of the transcript discloses that there is ample evidence of substantial character to support the finding complained of. In accordance therefore with the familiar and well-established rule that an appellate court will not disturb findings of the trial court where there is a conflict in the evidence, the finding of noninjury to appellants by reason of the proposed diversion by the Foothill irrigation district must stand.

[2] It is, however, most zealously contended that the proposed diversion may not lawfully be made even though the finding of the trial court that it may be accomplished without injury to appellants is sustained. It is said that section 1412 of the Civil Code which permits a change in the point of diversion by an appropriator of water if others are not injured thereby is limited in its application to a change in the place of diversion of the entire quantity of water entitled to be taken and that it has no application to and does not permit a change in the place of diversion where it is proposed to split the appropriation. In support of this contention the case of Consolidated People's Ditch Co. v. Foothill Ditch Co. et al., reported in 205 Cal. at page 54, 269 P. 915, 921, is cited by counsel for appellants. This decision of the Supreme Court is obviously so thoroughly relied upon by counsel for appellants that careful consideration of it is warranted. The facts of the case are as follows: An irrigation district purchased stock in certain corporations which owned accrued rights of appropriation of the water of a stream and which possessed ditches for the diversion of such water as each corporation had become entitled to receive among the owners of capital stock of each. The irrigation district then contracted to purchase an interest in a ditch which took off from the river above the points of intake of plaintiffs' ditches and proposed to divert by this ditch an amount of water equaling the aggregate amount of water to which by virtue of its ownership of stock in the several corporations it would have been entitled to receive. The plaintiffs succeeded in securing a preliminary injunction the granting of which was sustained by the Supreme Court. It was decided by the Supreme Court that the owners of stock in those corporations in which the irrigation district had become a stockholder were equitable owners of that proportion of the properties of each of such corporations which their respective stock ownerships bore to the entire subscribed capital stock of each corporation and that only to that extent were such stockholders owners of the water rights which the corporation possessed and over whose distribution it exercised exclusive control. It was said by the court that the sole right of each stockholder in each corporation was the right to have his proportionate share in the water owned by the corporation supplied to him through the instrumentalities provided by the corporation for such distribution and in no other manner. The court then goes on to point out that to sustain the contention of the irrigation district that by reason of its ownership of stock in various corporations it was entitled to go higher up the river than the points of intake of each corporation of which it was a stockholder and there to establish a system of ditches sufficient in capacity to enable it to divert the amount of water represented in its aggregated holdings of corporate stock would necessarily result in the conclusion that each stockholder in each of said corporations would have similar rights and the court said: "It is too plain for argument that such an admission would result in a state of inextricable discord and confusion among the owners of water rights of various sorts along the course, not only of the Kaweah river, but of every other river and stream of water in California where similar rights, by appropriation or otherwise, in the flowing waters of these streams are in the course of acquisition and exercise. The creation or threatened danger of such a consequence would of itself supply a sufficient reason for the use of the injunctive processes of the court in the way of its prevention."

This language of the Supreme Court, so strongly relied upon by appellants herein, must of course be read in connection with the main problem which the court had before it for solution. That problem had to do with the rights of stockholders in corporations which own water rights in streams and which possess ditches and other instrumentalities for the diversion and distribution of the water which they own to their respective stockholders. There is no holding by the court that there may not be a change in the point of diversion by an appropriator of water of a portion of the water to whose use he is entitled. In the case of Perry v. Calkins, 159 Cal. 175, 113 P. 136, 138, the trial court found that the city of Yreka was entitled to take fifty inches of water through a certain ditch one-half mile above the ditch of plaintiffs. The court also found that the city had a right to take thirty-five inches from the creek by reason of a submerged dam built by it about two miles above plaintiffs' ditch. In its decision the Supreme Court says: "If this 35 inches was claimed as a part of the 50 inches which the city had acquired the right to divert by means of the Scheld drain, it would be a mere change of the place of diversion which the city might make if it caused no injury to plaintiffs. Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 517, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331, 101 P. 790."

In this case therefore the Supreme Court recognizes the right of an appropriator to divide an appropriation. We fail to discover any sound reason why an appropriator of water from a stream may not divide the appropriation provided it does not appear that by such division injury will result to others who have vested rights in such water. It may well be that some inconvenience will result from the proposed division by the irrigation district of its appropriation. The division of the appropriation may even result in some confusion but unless it is made to appear that injury will result therefrom to appellants they are not entitled to the aid of equity to prevent the division. The limitation which counsel urge should be read into section 1412 of the Civil Code is not warranted.

[3] Numerous specifications of errors which it is contended were committed by the trial court and numerous particulars in which it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment of the trial court are assignea. A careful review of the evidence appearing in the printed transcript fails to disclose any harmful errors committed by the trial court. Nor does it appear that the findings and judgment of the court in any material respect lack the necessary justification of evidence.

[4] In its conclusions of law the trial court determined that the defendants were entitled to recover two-thirds of their costs of suit and it was so decreed by the judgment. The contention of counsel for appellants that costs should have been allowed appellants is without merit. The complaint was for an injunction and the action is purely equitable in its scope. The allowance of costs rested therefore in the discretion of the court. Code Civ. Proc. § 1025; Abram v. Stuart, 96 Cal. 235, 31 P. 44; Gallatin v. Corning Irrigation Co., 163 Cal. 405, 126 P. 864, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 74.

The judgment is affirmed.

"Profit à prendre" is "interest or estate in land," being right to take something out of soil of another, distinguished from "easement."

A "profit à prendre" is a right to take part of the soil or produce of the land of another, as a right to take timber or coal; it is a right to take something out of the soil of another, as a right of common, and also some minor rights as a right to fish, hunt, and hawk, or to mine metals, dig for oil, take oil from the land, the principal feature of which is that it is an interest or estate in the land itself which distinguishes it from a pure "easement," which is a right or interest without profit, there being in case of an easement an absence of all right to participate in the profits of the soil charged therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Easement," "Estate In Land," "Interest > (In Property)" and "Profit À Prendre," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Licenses 🔑44(1).

"Profit à prendre" creates interest in realty in nature of covenant running with land, distinguished from personal obligation of owner.

3. Licenses 🔑44(1).

"Profit à prendre" carries right of entry and right to remove from land designated products or "profits."

4. Licenses 🔑44(2).

Common oil or gas lease under which lessee is entitled to enter, develop, and remove oil or gas is "profit à prendre."

> This is so because oil and gas is part of "realty," and is "real property" until severed.

> [Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Real Property" and "Realty," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Mines and minerals 🔑55(6).

There can be no grant or conveyance of oil or gas in place separate and apart from right to enter premises and extract them.

6. Mines and minerals 🔑48.

Oil and gas are part of "realty" until severed and controlled, and thereafter "personal property," subject to sale as such.

7. Mines and minerals 🔑55(2).

Contract to sell crude petroleum produced by owner from wells on premises, deliverable from tankage of owner, held executory contract for sale of personalty, conveying no interest in land.

> Such contract conferred no right on buyer to enter premises and develop oil, or to sever oil from realty. It was plain, executory contract for sale of personal property of and when property should come into possession of seller; exclusive right to develop and produce oil being left with seller. He retained exclusive possession and title of and to realty, and hence of oil in ground, until oil was severed and delivered to tanks maintained by him on own premises, and before oil was thus delivered to tanks buyer had no legal title.

8. Mines and minerals 🔑55(2).

Executory contract to sell oil produced on premises, deliverable from owner's tankage, conveys no title until oil reaches tanks, though contract permits buyer to construct pipe line to tanks to facilitate delivery.

9. Injunction 🔑59(1).

Injunction did not lie against seller to restrain breach of contract to sell oil to be produced, damages being ascertainable, since there was adequate remedy at law and contract not being specifically enforceable (Civ. Code, §§ 3308, 3387).

> Civ. Code § 3308, provides measure of damages for breach of agreement to deliver personal property, and section 3387 provides that it is to be presumed that breach of agreement to transfer personal property can be adequately relieved by pecuniary compensation; there being no evidence in record tending to rebut that presumption.

10. Specific performance 🔑68.

Contract for sale of personalty, damages for breach being ascertainable is not specifically enforceable; remedy being action for damages (Civ. Code, §§ 3308, 3387).

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for an injunction and for an accounting. The interveners entered the litigation for the aid of plaintiff. Judgment went for plaintiff and interveners, awarding them a permanent injunction and damages. The defendants appeal upon a bill of exceptions.

Plaintiff and one Horwitz executed a written contract whereby the former agreed to purchase, and the latter agreed to sell and deliver, the crude oil which Horwitz might produce from a certain well being sunk in the Alamitos Heights district. Deliveries were to be made from the tanks of the owner located on the property to which the oil company was permitted to connect its pipe lines. A maximum daily and monthly delivery was fixed by the contract, and the price agreed to be paid for the oil was the market price as determined by "the prices per barrel publicly offered by the Standard Oil Company of California at dates of delivery * * * for oil of like graivity and quality." A special price of ten cents a barrel below market was fixed for the first fifty thousand barrels delivered.

Horwitz deeded the property in fee simple to the defendant Clark after he had failed to develop oil and had abandoned work on the well. Clark then executed a contract with his codefendant, Hercules Gasoline Company, for the sale of the oil at a more favorable price than that covered by the Horwitz contract.

The theory upon which the interveners came into the litigation was this: Horwitz had assigned to these interveners certain percentages "of the gross production of all the oil, gas and other hydrocarbon substances saved and sold from any well drilled" upon the premises. The proceeds of the sale of the oil produced were to be deposited in a Long Beach bank which was authorized to pay over to the interveners their proportional shares. Alleging that the defendant Clark was insolvent, and that their damages for breach of their contracts could not be ascertained, they prayed for the same injunctive relief sought by the plaintiff. In order to bring the cause within the equity jurisdiction of the court, the plaintiff and the interveners pleaded that the defendant Clark was insolvent, and that the failure of Clark to abide by the terms of his contract with plaintiff would result in irreparable damage to them. The plaintiff also alleged that, in reliance upon the contract, it had installed expensive pipe lines for conveying the oil from the premises. The trial court found that it was not true that defendant Clark was insolvent; it failed to find on plaintiff's allegation that it made expenditures in reliance upon the contract, but all the evidence showed that the allegation was not true. It drew the conclusion of law that plaintiff and interveners would suffer irreparable damage because there was no way to ascertain the amount of compensation to afford them adequate relief.

On the appeal from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the appellants insist that the oil company failed to present a case for equitable relief upon the contract because (1) the contract did not create an interest in real property; and (2) it being merely an agreement to sell personal property which could not be specifically enforced, the plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law for damages for the breach. Many assignments of error are also relied on, but, as we are in accord with appellants in the two foregoing propositions, and as the judgment must be reversed for that reason, we will not discuss the other assignments in so far as they relate to the plaintiff.

[1-6] The theory upon which the plaintiff relies to maintain its claim that the contract created an interest in the land is that it establish a "profit à prendre." The courts of this state have never been in doubt about the true meaning and intent of the expression "profit à prendre." Ruling Case Law defines it as "a right to take a part of the soil or produce of the land," such as the right to take timber or coal, or to fish in the water of another. 9 R. C. L. p. 744. It is distinguished from an easement, one of the features of which is the absence of all right to participate in the profits of the soil charged with it. A "profit à prendre" is considered an interest or an estate in the land itself, and this is the principal feature which distinguishes it from a pure easement, which is a right or interest without profit. It is a right to take something out of the soil of another, as a right of common, and also some minor rights as a right to fish, hunt, and hawk, or to mine metals, dig for oil; take oil from the land.

The feature of the right which is of interest to the point under consideration is that it creates an interest in the real property in the nature of a covenant running with the land as distinguished from a mere personal obligation of the owner of the realty. The underlying principle of the right is that it carries the right of entry and the right to remove and take from the land the designated product or "profit." A typical case is the right to cut and remove standing timber and the right to mine and remove coal or other minerals. Thus, the common oil and gas lease under which the lessee is entitled to enter upon the land of the lessor and develop and remove oil or gas is a "profit à prendre." The authorities are agreed on this principle, basing their reasoning on the ground that the oil and gas is a part of the realty and is real property until severed. Out of this rule has grown the further doctrine that there can be no grant or conveyance of oil or gas in place separate and apart from the right to go upon the premises and extract them. Thornton's Law of Oil and Gas, vol. 1, p. 148; Rich v. Doneghey, 71 Okl. 204, 177 P. 86, 90, 3 A. L. R. 352; Campbell v. Smith, 180 Ind. 159, 101 N. E. 89. There are exceptions to this rule found in the decisions coming from the states of Texas and Kentucky, where the courts have held that oil and gas in place are minerals subject to separate ownership, severance, and sale in like manner as coal and other solid minerals. Stephens County v. Mid-Kansas Oil & Gas Co., 113 Tex. 160, 254 S. W. 290, 29 A. L. R. 566; United Fuel Gas Co. v. Swiss Oil Corp. (C. C. A.) 41 F.(2d) 4.

This difference of opinion as to the rights of the landowner in the oil and gas in place explains some of the authorities cited by respondent on the application of the doctrine of "profit à prendre"; but we have found the authorities agreed that these substances are a part of the realty until severed and brought under control, and that, when this has been done, they are personal property subject to sale as such. Southwest Pipe Line Co. v. Empire Nat. Gas Co. (C. C. A.) 33 F.(2d) 248, 252, 64 A. L. R. 1229; Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 208, 20 S. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729.

[7, 8] Under the contract upon which plaintiff relies, the owner of the land agreed to sell to plaintiff all the crude petroleum produced by the owner from the wells located on the premises, deliveries to be made from the tankage of the owner. This contract confers no right upon the plaintiff to enter the premises and develop oil or to sever the oil from the realty. It is a plain executory contract for the sale of personal property of and when that property should come into the possession of the vendor. The exclusive right to develop and produce the oil is left with the vendor. He retains exclusive possession and title of and to the realty, and hence of the oil in the ground, until the oil is severed and delivered to the tanks maintained by him on his own premises. Before the oil is thus delivered to the tanks, the vendee has no legal title, and it matters not that it is permitted under the contract to construct a pipe line to the tanks to facilitate delivery. We can see no distinction between this situation and one where the owner of realty contracts to sell fruits raised on his premises, deliveries to be made at a warehouse maintained by him with a right to the vendee of ingress to, and egress from, the warehouse for purpose of delivery. Certainly in such a case no interest in the land is conveyed.

[9] Concluding, as we must, that the contract in suit did not convey any interest in the real property, but that it was merely a contract to sell personal property, it necessarily follows that plaintiff is not entitled to equitable relief, because (1) it has an adequate remedy at law; and (2) the contract is not subject to specific enforcement.

[10-12] Plaintiff's remedy for the alleged breach of the contract is statutory. Section 3308, Civil Code, provides that the detriment caused by the seller's breach of an agreement to deliver personal property shall be deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value of the property to the buyer over the contract price. Thus the plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law for the damages resulting from the breach, if any, with the measure of damages clearly fixed by law. Section 3387, Civil Code, provides that it is to be presumed that the breach of an agreement to transfer personal property can be adequately relieved by pecuniary compensation, and there is no evidence in this record tending to rebut that presumption. The trial court found that plaintiff's damages could not be "readily" ascertained, but there was no evidence supporting the finding, and, if the finding were true, it would be so only because there would be no excess of the value of the oil to the plaintiff over the contract (or market) price, and, hence, no damage to plaintiff. Thus the suit of plaintiff resolves itself into an action to compel the specific performance of a contract for the sale of personal property where the damages, if any, to the plaintiff could be ascertained in the event of a breach. That such an action does not lie under such circumstances is the rule of Poultry Producers, etc., v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 278, 288, 208 P. 93. Pertinent to the questions before us the court in that case (page 289 of 189 Cal., 208 P. 93, 97) said: "Growing out of the last of the three enumerated reasons for the rule that equity will not specifically enforce a contract for services that are of a strictly personal nature is the cognate rule that courts of equity will not decree the specific performance of contracts which by their terms stipulate for a succession of acts whose performance cannot be consummated by one transaction, but will be continuous and require protracted supervision and direction." To the same effect are: Chandler v. Hollingsworth, 96 Cal. App. 472, 478, 274 P. 581; Sheehan v. Vedder (Cal. App.) 292 P. 175; Moore v. Heron (Cal. App.) 292 P. 136; and Pomeroy on Specific Performance (3d Ed.) § 312.

In the same case it was held that an injunction would not lie to prevent a breach of such a contract, and this rule has been generally followed. See Duvall v. White, 46 Cal. App. 305, 308, 189 P. 324; Emirzian v. Asato, 23 Cal. App. 251, 255, 137 P. 1072. The reason for the rule is well expressed by Mr. Justice Chipman in the latter case (page 256 of 23 Cal. App., 137 P. 1072, 1075): "If the personal property has a market value, is bought and sold in the open market, and has no special or unique value, the remedy at law is sufficient, since with the unpaid purchase money and the moneys recovered by action the vendee can buy in the open market property of the same character as that contracted for, if the vendor is in fault."

The evidence is undisputed that there was a great oversupply of crude oil in the Alamitos fields, and that the plaintiff was obtaining all that its refineries could handle. It was also undisputed that the market price of crude oil was fixed periodically by the Standard Oil Company, and that these prices were treated as the daily market price by all those dealing in oil. Though no evidence was taken on the subject, it is a matter of common knowledge that the daily flow of oil can be readily measured. The case is not unlike the illustration given in the Emirzian Case, reading from page 257 of 23 Cal. App., 137 P. 1072, 1075: "We cannot see that this case is any different from that where a farmer agrees to sell, but afterward refuses to deliver, a certain number of tons of alfalfa hay or other product of his farm of which there is an abundance to be purchased in the open market. In such a case we do not think it would for a moment be contended that the vendee could go into an equity court and restrain this farmer from selling his hay to some other person, compel him to irrigate or otherwise care for it, and bale and deliver it to the vendee at some future time."

Stripping the appeal from all the byplay, we hold that the plaintiff did not present an action for equitable relief—its remedy is an action for damages for alleged breach of a simple contract to sell personal property, but, as to its right to recover damages on that contract, we express no opinion. The interveners had no place in the litigation at any stage of the proceeding. Their rights rest entirely upon their assignments of the proceeds of the sale of the oil—they had no right at any time to designate the vendee. If their assignments are valid and enforceable against these defendants, they could then be heard to insist that the proceeds of the sale of the oil be deposited with the Long Beach bank in accordance with the terms of their assignments. But these are questions which are not involved in this appeal.

The judgment is reversed.

City held as matter of law not chargeable with negligence in erection and maintenance of "tackling dummy" upon school campus, where charter granted control over schools to board of education (St. 1911, pp. 1913, 1916, 1924, 1938, §§ 6, 73, and 52, subd. 4).

4. Schools and school districts 🔑62.

Members of board of education held not individually liable for injuries resulting from negligent installation or maintenance of "tackling dummy" upon school campus (Pol. Code, § 1623).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Action by John Mitchell against Frank R. Hartman and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joseph A. Allard, City Atty., of Pomona, for respondent City of Pomona.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Ernest Purdum, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for other respondents.

GRAY, Justice pro tem.

Appellant sued the city of Pomona and the individual members of its board of education for the death of his son, who was killed by the fall, upon his body, of the supporting framework of a "tackling dummy" which he was then using. Respondents' liability, as alleged, is based upon their negligent erection and maintenance of the "tackling dummy" upon the campus of a junior high school, which deceased was then attending. Holding that the liability, if any, rested upon the school district, not joined as a party, the court granted motions for a nonsuit, separately made by the city and the members.

[1-3] Appellant argues that, because the city's charter (Stats. 1911, p. 1913) authorizes the city to acquire, establish, maintain, own, and operate schools, provides for the election of a board of education, and invests such board with the entire control and management of the schools in the city, the school in question owed its inception, existence, and maintenance to the city, and therefore the city is liable for the tortious acts of the board created by it. The accuracy of these conclusions is dependent upon the correctness of the premises, based upon the charter. Section 6 of the charter (page 1916) provides that: "The elective officers of the city shall be * * * a president * * * and four members of the board of education. * * " Section 52, subdivision 4 (page 1924) reads as follows: " * * The city of Pomona shall have the right and power: * * * To acquire * * * and to establish, maintain, equip, own and operate * * * schools. * * *" Section 73 (page 1938) states that: "The board of education shall have entire control and management of the public schools in the city in accordance with the constitution and general laws of the state, and is hereby vested with all the powers and charged with all the duties provided by this charter and by the general laws of the state for city boards of education." (Italics ours.) While as to matters of tenure and compensation, which are matters that may be regulated by the charter (Const. art. 11, § 8½, subd. 2), members of the board of education have been treated as municipal officers (Stern v. City Council of Berkeley, 25 Cal. App. 685, 145 P. 167; Ackerman v. Moody, 38 Cal. App. 461, 176 P. 696; People v. Ralph, 67 Cal. App. 270, 227 P. 642), yet such members, after induction into office, become officers of a political subdivision of the state, separate and distinct from the municipality, within whose boundaries the school district is located. Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 74 P. 44; Ward v. San Diego School Dist., 203 Cal. 712, 265 P. 821. Although there is no evidence to show that city funds were used in the erection or maintenance of the school, yet, if there were, such fact would not make the school a municipal affair and subject it to the city's control. Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 P. 558; Los Angeles School Dist. v. Longden, 148 Cal. 380, 83 P. 246; Ward v. San Diego School Dist., supra. Section 73 by its grant to the board of the entire control and management of the school "in accordance with the constitution and general laws of the state" not only negatives any idea that the charter considers the control and management of the schools a municipal affair, but expressly recognizes that the city schools form part of the state system and are to be managed and controlled in accordance with the state's laws. This is further emphasized by the imposition upon the board of the duties and powers provided by state law. We are satisfied that the city had no duty with reference to the erection and maintenance of the "tackling dummy," and therefore cannot be charged with negligence in that regard.

[4] We are also satisfied that the court correctly held that the members of the board were not individually liable. Section 1623 of the Political Code gives a right of action against the school district for an injury to any pupil arising because of the negligence of the district or its officers. Ahern v. Livermore Union High School Dist., 208 Cal. 770, 284 P. 1105. The last paragraph of this section expressly exempts members of city boards of education from personal liability for accidents to children on the playgrounds. Dawson v. Tulare Union High School, 98 Cal. App. 138, 276 P. 424.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. FARIA et ux.

Civ. 4315.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 11, 1931.

1. Damages 🔑85.

Lessees' covenant to pay $20 for each acre "not in first-class alfalfa stand" did not limit lessor's right to recover actual damages.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑49(2).

Evidence of greater rental value of land in first-class alfalfa stand held to sustain award of damages for lessees' breach of covenant to produce such stand.

The evidence showed that rental value of lands covered with first-class stand of alfalfa is over $20 more per acre than land not so covered, and the court found that lessor was damaged in sum of $800 by lessees' failure to plant alfalfa on 40 acres of land.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑55(3).

Evidence held to sustain finding that lessees took no reasonable precautions to prevent burning of silo and barn.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑55(3).

Evidence held insufficient to support court's finding as to value of silo and barn when destroyed by fire because of lessees' negligence.

There was testimony as to good condition of barn and silo three or four months before fire and cost of constructing new ones of same dimensions, but no testimony as to depreciation of either since their erection.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Flora J. Williams against John Faria and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions.

James F. Peck, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Edwin H. Williams, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendants for the sum of $2,050, based upon a complaint setting forth two causes of action. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

This first cause of action set forth in the plaintiff's complaint alleges the lease of certain lands and premises in Stanislaus county, whereby the plaintiff leased to the defendants the premises described in the complaint, and the defendants covenanted and agreed to set out, plant, and have standing on said premises at least 40 acres in a first-class stand of alfalfa, "and to maintain the same in first-class condition, and to turn the ranch back to the owner upon the termination of said lease, with at least 40 acres of first-class alfalfa stand thereon, or otherwise to pay to the owner $20.00 for each acre less than 40 acres which is not in first-class alfalfa stand."

After referring to the lease and making it a part thereof, the complaint further alleges that the defendants failed to put the demised premises in good order and condition; failed to clear the same of weeds, but allowed the same to become foul with noxious weeds, sand burrs, foxtail, etc., to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000; and further alleges that the defendants failed to put any portion of said premises, or have on said premises a first-class stand of alfalfa; that the defendants failed to establish any alfalfa whatever on said premises, to the further damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $800.

While the form of the lease is such that an action might have been prosecuted as and for liquidated damages, the record before us shows that it was not so prosecuted. The second cause of action set out in the complaint is one for damages based upon the destruction by fire of a certain silo and barn standing on the leased premises, it being alleged that the destruction by fire of said buildings resulted from the carelessness, negligence, etc., of the defendants, to the further damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,600. In all, judgment for damages was asked in the sum of $3,400.

Two questions are presented to us for consideration upon this appeal, to-wit: Whether findings A and B are supported by the testimony. Finding A is to the effect that the defendants failed to set out and have standing upon said premises any marketable or first-class alfalfa, or stand of alfalfa whatsoever, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $800. Finding B is to the effect that, by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendants, a silo and large barn situated on said premises at the time the defendants took possession of, and occupied, the same, were totally destroyed by fire, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,250.

[1] The contention of the appellants is to the effect that the action could only be prosecuted, in relation to the alfalfa, as one for liquidated damages, and that, as the complaint does not set forth sufficient facts to sustain an action for liquidated damages, no cause of action is set forth as to said item. We do not find any merit in this contention. The fact that the parties entering into the lease did covenant to pay the sum of $20 per acre for each and every acre which they failed to set out and plant, and have standing in first-class alfalfa, in no wise limited the right of the plaintiff to sue for the actual damages resulting from the failure of the defendants to comply with the covenants of the lease to set out, and have standing, the alfalfa upon the premises according to the agreement. The question of $20 damages per acre may be admitted to be void, as claimed by the appellants, but this does not bar the plaintiff from proving or attempting to prove, or the introduction of testimony tending to prove, the actual damages suffered. While the testimony in the record is brief, it is to the effect that land in the district where the premises are situated, if covered by a first-class stand of alfalfa, is worth more than $20 per acre over and above land that does not carry such a stand of alfalfa.

[2] It is further shown in the record that the rental value of lands covered with a first-class stand of alfalfa is worth more than land not so covered, to an extent greater than $20 per acre, which, applied to the covenant of the lease entered into by the defendants to plant, set out, and have standing at least 40 acres of said premises, sustains an award of damages in the sum of $800. We do not need to quote the testimony as to the failure to establish a first-class stand of alfalfa, because it is practically all to the effect that the land is and was, at the time of the prosecution of this action, covered by foul weeds, sand burrs, and Bermuda grass, and that no stand of alfalfa whatever was established by the appellants.

Two elements enter into the determination of whether finding B, as to the damages to the barn and silo, caused by fire, can be sustained: First, as to whether the appellants are chargeable with negligence for their destruction; second, as to whether there is any proof of the value of the silo, and barn at the time of their destruction, and therefore whether there is any proof of the damages sustained by the plaintiff for their destruction.

[3] At the time of the fire, which occurred the latter part of May, 1928, the premises were in charge of an agent of the defendants named Silva, who, with his family, was residing upon the leased premises. According to his testimony dry grass, foxtails, weeds, and other rubbish had been allowed to grow up and around the silo and barn and over a small tract of the leased premises adjacent thereto; that at about 2 o'clock on the afternoon of the fire he went out and hoed about 10 feet of the grass and weeds adjacent to the silo, and thereafter set fire to the weeds and dry grass upon the tract to which we have referred; that he so set the fire as to burn away from the silo and barn, and so as to cause the fire to travel in a northerly direction from the silo and barn; that he had supplied himself with buckets and wet sacks for the purpose of protecting the silo and barn from fire, and also to protect the residence in which he and his family resided, from being burned. If the court were to accept the testimony of the witness Silva, and to disregard the circumstances surrounding the fire and the atmospheric conditions testified to by others, then and in that case a judgment for the defendants, upon the second count in the complaint, might readily be sustained on the theory that no negligence is shown by the record. However, there is testimony of other witnesses to the effect that the wind was blowing from the north, which would carry sparks to the silo and barn. There is also testimony in the record to the effect that very strong winds are to be anticipated every afternoon, and that the prevailing direction of the winds in the San Joaquin Valley where this fire occurred is from the north toward the south. The testimony also shows that no precautions had ever been taken to guard the silo and barn from fire by plowing around the same so as to kill or destroy or prevent the growth of noxious weeds adjacent thereto. The testimony is also entirely silent as to what Mr. Silva did to put out the fire after he discovered it in the silo, and also silent as to anything being done by his wife and children whom he stated were there ready to assist him. While the witness does state that he hoed a short space or area 10 feet in width on one side of the silo, it does not show that there was not sufficient rubbish left there to cause the fire to communicate with the silo. According to the testimony of the witness Silva the fire started in the silo at the base thereof. True, the witness testified that about 15 minutes of 5 in the afternoon a whirlwind came up and carried burning rubbish to the silo and caused the same to become ignited. On the other hand, there is testimony of other witnesses who arrived shortly after the fire started to the effect that dry grass, weeds, etc., were burning in close proximity to the silo, and that the fire entered the silo through a decayed hole therein. The burning silo communicated the fire to the barn and caused its destruction. Witnesses who were present said that the wind, blowing from the north at the time of the fire, carried shingles from the barn at least a quarter of a mile. All of these circumstances, taken in connection with the time of the year when the fire was started, sufficiently justified the trial court in coming to the conclusion that no reasonable precautions had been taken to prevent the burning of the silo and the barn prior to the time when Silva, the employee of the defendants, set fire to the dry grass, weeds, etc., adjacent thereto. From all of which we conclude that the charge of negligence and carelessness in the destruction of the silo and barn is sufficiently proven.

[4] The contention of the appellants that there is no testimony in the record to support the finding of the trial court as to the value of the silo and the barn at the time of their destruction appears to be well founded.

The reporter's transcript contains only the following testimony (so far as we have been able to discover it) relative to the value of the silo and barn: The witness E. H. Williams testified that he visited the premises either in January or February, 1928, preceding the month of May when the fire occurred; that the barn and silo were then in good condition. A witness by the name of Rebman testified as to the reasonable cost of constructing a silo in 1928, of the dimensions described to him corresponding with the dimensions of the burned silo, and stated that it would cost $700. This witness likewise testified that the cost of constructing a barn of the size and kind described to him would, in 1928, have been the reasonable sum of $1,600, and that the sum of $2,300 would be a reasonable sum to cover the costs of erecting a silo and barn of the dimensions described herein. It may be admitted, as contended by the respondent, that the barn and silo were in first-class condition in January, 1928, and it may be admitted that they were in such condition the latter part of May, 1928, there being no testimony one way or the other as to their condition. The facts are, however, that the barn was erected 15 years preceding its destruction, and also that the silo had been standing for about 11 years, and there is not a single scintilla of testimony in the record relative to the depreciation of the silo and barn during that period of time.

Even though it be admitted, as contended by the respondent, that the dryness of the atmosphere, in the locality where the barn and silo were situated, is such that depreciation is slow, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that a barn that has been standing for 15 years, and apparently used during at least a considerable period of that time, has depreciated to a considerable extent, and the same must be true of a silo. There is not a word in the testimony indicating whether either of the structures had been protected from the weather by being kept painted or kept in repair, or any facts shown in relation thereto, save and except the opinion of one of the witnesses that they were in first-class condition.

The respondent has cited the cases of Sickles v. Mt. Whitney Power Co., 177 Cal. 278, 170 P. 599; Linforth v. San Francisco Gas Co., 156 Cal. 58, 103 P. 320, 322, 19 Ann. Cas. 1230; and Gosliner v. Briones, 187 Cal. 557, 204 P. 19, to the effect that the cost of reconstructing destroyed buildings may properly be admitted in evidence. But none of these cases support the contention that such proof is adequate to sustain a finding as to the amount of the damages, as the following excerpt from the case of Linforth v. Gas & Electric Co., supra, sufficiently shows: "Evidence of the original cost of the building was admitted. Under the circumstances it was proper so to do. This evidence of original cost, standing alone, would, of course, have slight or no weight in determining the award of damages." This was used in relation to the reconstruction and repairing of a damaged building. In this case, as in the other cases cited, such evidence is admissible, but, standing alone, is wholly insufficient.

In Cleland v. Thornton, 43 Cal. 437, an action prosecuted for damages caused to buildings by fire, evidence as to the cost of new buildings to replace those burned was admitted. The court held that the evidence was admissible, not as affording a criterion of damages, but merely as furnishing some data by which the court would be enabled to estimate approximately the value of the old building. The court said: "There was no error in the ruling of the Court admitting the evidence as to the cost of new buildings to replace those which were burned. The evidence was admissible as furnishing some data by which the Court would be enabled to estimate approximately the value of the old buildings; and it is evident from the opinion and order of the Court, that it was received and considered for this purpose only, and not as affording a criterion of damages."

Much confusion appears to have arisen by reason of the different views expressed by courts as to the proper method of ascertaining damages to property having no market value, and especially of buildings attached to the real estate. One method is that of ascertaining the value of the real estate before the destruction of the buildings, and the value of the real estate after their destruction. Other courts have sought to ascertain the value of the destroyed buildings separate and distinct from the real estate upon which they were erected. Some of the courts admit testimony as to cost of replacement; others, as to the original cost of the buildings.

In the case of Kennedy v. Treleaven, 103 Kan. 651, 175 P. 977, 978, 7 A. L. R. 274, these rules are considered, and in the annotations in this case may be found collected a large number of cases supporting the different methods adopted for ascertaining the value of destroyed buildings. In the case referred to the Supreme Court of Kansas thus expressed its views: "There being no malice nor intentional wrongdoing, compensation is the proper measure, and hence the defendant was liable for the reasonable value of the building burned at the time and place of its destruction. There is no universal test for determining the value of property injured or destroyed, and the mode and amount of proof must be adapted to the facts of each case." After speaking of the rule relative to the original cost of the destroyed buildings, the court approves the following: "One method of arriving at such loss is by estimating the cost of replacing the building, less any depreciation from use, age, or otherwise; and the other is by evidence of the value of the building at the time of its destruction, less the value, if any, of the ruins. * * * Evidence of the cost of a building, however, can hardly be said to be evidence of its value at a particular time."

The court likewise approves the rule laid down in 8 Ruling Case Law 485, which is substantially as follows: "To arrive at the damages sustained, where the building burned had no market value, resort may be had to any facts which fairly tend to show its actual value when it was destroyed, and a permissible method of proof is by showing the cost of replacing the building, less any depreciation from age, use, utility or condition." This case is also to the effect that, where a building has been standing for a great length of time, the original cost of the building is irrelevant. The majority rule, as shown by the annotations appended to the case of Kennedy v. Treleaven, supra, is to the effect that the cost of replacing the burned structure may be admitted, not as proof in and of itself as value, but may be considered in connection with testimony showing the age of the destroyed building, its depreciation, condition, use, etc., in determining the value of the destroyed building at the date of its destruction.

In the case of Jennings v. Oregon Land Co., 48 Or. 287, 86 P. 367, 368, we find the following relative to testimony concerning the value of a building destroyed by fire, to wit: "Testimony as to its cost was, therefore, proper, not as of itself proof of value, but to aid the jury to arrive at an accurate conclusion in the matter, and to enable them to test the worth of the opinion evidence on that subject"—citing a number of cases.

In the case at bar, as we have stated, there is no evidence whatever showing the extent of the depreciation of the destroyed buildings. There is, in fact, no evidence whatever as to their condition, except the expression of an opinion of one of the witnesses. There is no evidence whatever of the value of the buildings at the time of their destruction. The court in its findings fixed the value at $1,250. There is not a scintilla of evidence in the record indicating that the figure fixed by the court was the value of the buildings at the time of their destruction. For all that the record shows, the finding of the court is based upon the mere expression of opinion of one witness, that the reasonable cost of replacing the silo would be the sum of $700, and the reasonable cost of replacing the barn would be the sum of $1,600. The cases which we have cited, and the cases reported in the annotations found in 7 American Law Reports, beginning on page 277, are all to the effect that such testimony is insufficient to support a finding of the value of the destroyed building.

It follows from what we have said that the finding as to the damage suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the destruction of the silo and barn is not supported by the testimony, and that a retrial must be had as to this issue.

It is therefore ordered that, as to all other issues involved in this action, the judgment will be, and the same is hereby, affirmed, and that as to the one issue, to wit, the damage suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the destruction of the silo and barn, be, and the same is hereby, reversed, with directions to the trial court to proceed and determine the value of said buildings at the date of their destruction.

It is further ordered that neither party recover from the other costs of this appeal.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment for damages for the breach of a contract for the purchase of an automobile truck, and from an order taxing costs.

The plaintiff held a contract to deliver sixty tons of clay to the Lincoln pottery. He was engaged in hauling this material from a pit at White Rock, a distance of thirty-three miles by means of a Fageol truck. He desired a larger truck which could make greater speed. He purchased an International truck from the defendant for $7,600. He paid $2,500 on the purchase price at the time of the execution of the contract. He was also credited with the further sum of $2,600, the agreed value of a Mack truck which he traded to the defendant on the bargain. The balance of the purchase price was to be subsequently paid.

The chief controversy involves the question as to whether certain printed portions of a form of contract became part of the agreement to purchase the truck. The purchase was consummated at the defendant's place of business. The plaintiff was handed a copy of the usual form of contract. Most of the blank spaces on the upper half of the front page of this form were filled in by the defendant in typewriting. The spaces regarding the "rated capacity" and the "maximum capacity" of the machine were left blank. Below the typewriting, near the middle of the front page, a vacant line was left. Upon the lower half of this front page, below the blank line referred to, there were printed several paragraphs containing certain detailed conditions. At the bottom of the page there were blank lines for the signature of the purchaser and the acceptance of the seller. On the opposite side of this document there was a printed warranty. For convenient reference this document will be divided into paragraphs A, B, and C. This instrument appears in the following language:

[A]

"Order for International Harvester Motor Truck

"Warranty

[C]

"The International Harvester Company of America (Incorporated) warrants each new International Motor Truck to be free from defects in material and workmanship under normal use and service, its obligation under this guaranty being limited to making good at the factory any part or parts thereof, which shall within ninety (90) days after delivery of such truck to the original purchaser be returned to its Branch House or factory with transportation charges prepaid and which examination shall disclose to the Company's satisfaction to have been thus defective.

"This warranty shall not apply to any motor truck which shall have been operated at a speed exceeding the factory rated speed or loaded beyond the factory rated capacity as indicated on the plate attached to each truck, nor to any motor truck which shall have been repaired or altered outside of the Company's branch office or factory in any way so as, in said Company's judgment, to affect its stability or reliability, nor which has been subject to misuse, negligence or accident.

"The above warranties are in lieu of all other warranties express or implied and no person, agent or dealer is authorized to give any other warranties on the Company's behalf or to assume for it any other liability in connection with any motor truck.

"No warranties whatever are given in respect to tires, rims, electrical apparatus, horns, signaling devices, generators, batteries, speedometers, hubometers, or other trade accessories inasmuch as they are usually guaranteed separately by their respective manufacturers."

The plaintiff signed the foregoing instrument on the blank line beneath the typewritten portion near the middle of the front page. The printed conditions were all below his signature. The warranty was printed on the back of the form. The plaintiff testified that at the time he signed this document, he handed it back to the agent of the defendant, saying, "I am signing what is above my signature; I am not agreeing to anything below." It was stated by the plaintiff that it was agreed by the parties only that portion of the document which appears above his signature was to become the written contract, but that other conditions and guaranties were subsequently orally agreed upon. There is a conflict in the evidence regarding these matters.

The suit is based upon a claim for damages for breach of contract with respect to the subsequent oral agreement regarding the capacity, equipment, and ability of the truck to perform. The chief contention is that the truck was guaranteed to travel 28 miles an hour with a load consisting of six cubic yards of clay; whereas the plaintiff was able to drive it only nine miles an hour, and that he was thereby damaged in a substantial loss of profits.

The complaint alleges that the defendant orally represented that the truck had a capacity of six cubic yards of sand or gravel which it was capable of hauling from the pit to Lincoln at a speed of 28 miles an hour; that it would be equipped with six stock wheels with dual firestone pneumatic tires, together with one spare wheel interchangeable on all axles of the truck; that it would also be equipped with an automatic self-starting contrivance and an automatic airpump to be attached to the motor for the purpose of inflating the tires; that the defendant was familiar with the truck then in use by the plaintiff, and with the clay pit from which he was engaged in hauling materials together with the highway over which he was transporting the sand and clay, and assured the plaintiff that the new truck would haul as much material and make as good time as the Fageol truck then operated by the plaintiff. It was then alleged the foregoing representations were each false; that the truck would not haul a load of six cubic yards of sand or gravel from the pit, and when loaded to capacity would not attain a speed in excess of nine miles an hour; that the truck was not equipped with a self-starter or automatic pump, and that the spare wheel was not interchangeable on any of the axles of the machine.

All the material allegations of the complaint were controverted by the defendant. In a cross-complaint the defendant set up the document heretofore quoted as an exhibit and alleged the entire instrument constituted the sole contract of sale; that the only guaranty with respect to the truck, its equipment or ability to perform, are limited to the express provisions of the contract. The defendant then alleged the nonpayment of the balance of the purchase price of the truck in the sum of $2,500 and prayed for judgment for that amount. The cause was tried with a jury. A verdict for damages in the sum of $1,500 was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. A separate verdict for the sum of $2,500 was rendered in favor of the defendant on its cross-complaint, for the unpaid portion of the purchase price of the truck. On a motion to tax costs, the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to $224.20 costs, and the defendant was entitled to recover $64.80 costs. The defendant appealed from the judgment for damages which was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and also from the order allowing plaintiff his costs of suit.

At the trial, over the objection of the appellant, the plaintiff was permitted to testify to the circumstances accompanying his signature of the purported contract of purchase, and that it was not the intention of the parties that paragraphs designated as "B" and "C" were to become a part of their written agreement. The plaintiff said that he told the defendant's agent: "I am signing what is above my signature; I am not agreeing to anything below." Thereafter the court refused to admit in evidence paragraphs B and C of said document. Over the objection of the appellant, to the effect that it tended to vary the terms of a written agreement, the plaintiff was permitted to testify to alleged terms and conditions of the sale in conflict with the provisions of paragraphs B and C of the foregoing document. Over the objection of the appellant the plaintiff was also permitted to testify to a measure of his alleged damages based upon his expectation of being able, under the defendant's guaranty, to haul from the pit three loads a day of not less than six cubic yards of material, the average net weight per load being in excess of 21,000 pounds.

The appellant contends that: (1) The court erred in permitting the plaintiff to testify that paragraph A of the foregoing document which appears above the signature of the plaintiff was the only portion of that written instrument which binds the parties; (2) the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence paragraphs B and C of the alleged contract; (3) the court erred in admitting evidence of alleged terms and conditions of the sale in conflict with the last two sections of the written agreement; and (4) the court erred in allowing plaintiff costs of suit.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion the court did not err in permitting the plaintiff to testify that he signed the first portion of the order of sale, herein designated as paragraph "A," with the intent and understanding that he was not to be bound by the printed portions of the document which followed his signature. The chief issue of the case was whether the printed paragraphs which we have designated "B" and "C" were intended to become a part of the written agreement for the purchase of the truck. Upon this subject there is a conflict of testimony. It became a question of the identity of the real contract. Under the circumstances of this case, the question as to what part of this document was intended by the parties to become their written agreement was one of fact to be determined by the jury. This question of fact must be decided from all the circumstances surrounding the execution of the document including the form, contents, and relative provisions of the entire instrument. The jury was clearly instructed, "It is exclusively for you to determine, as a question of fact, * * * whether that portion of the printed document, from the beginning thereof extending down to and including the signature of Jerry Shelley, * * * constituted a memorandum of the agreement between plaintiff and defendant F. B. Hart, * * * and whether or not it contained all of the terms and conditions entering into the agreement contemplated by said parties. * * *" The jury was further instructed that if they found that the parties, at the time of the signing of the document in question, intended that the entire instrument should constitute their agreement for the purchase of the truck, then "all of these terms and conditions made and constituted the contract between the parties." These instructions fairly presented to the jury the question as to whether the contracting parties intended to be bound only by the first portion of the written instrument which appears above the signature of the plaintiff, or by the entire document.

[3-6] It is a cardinal rule that parol evidence may not ordinarily be received to contradict or vary the unambiguous terms of a written instrument. Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) p. 656, § 434. When a contract for the purchase of personal property is executed on a printed form, which contains certain specific conditions which are printed at the bottom of the instrument or upon the back thereof, to which no reference is made in the preceding contract, and which are readily severable therefrom and the signature of the purchaser appears above these printed portions, it may become a question of fact as to whether the contracting parties intended to adopt the separate printed conditions as a part of their contract. Under such circumstances extrinsic evidence is competent to determine just what portion of the document constitutes the real contract. Certainly it is proper to admit evidence to identify the document which is relied upon as a contract to bind the parties. It is a primary rule in the construction of contracts to ascertain and render effective, if possible, the mutual intention of the parties, so far as this may be done without violating legal principles. 13 C. J. 523, § 482. Since there was a clear issue of fact tendered by the pleadings in the present case as to what portions of the document the parties intended to include as their contract, we are of the opinion the court did not err in admitting oral evidence upon this subject.

[7] The court sustained an objection to the defendant's offer to introduce in evidence the remaining printed portions of the document following the signature of the plaintiff. Since there was an issue as to whether these portions of the instrument were component parts of the contract, and the jury was entitled to consider the language of paragraphs B and C in determining whether the context thereof had any application to or became a part of the preceding portion of the instrument, the entire document should have been admitted in evidence.

[8] The appellant contends that it was error to admit testimony regarding conditions of the alleged contract subsequently agreed upon which are in violation of the printed terms of the document, for the reason that such evidence tends to vary the terms of the contract. Assuming that the parties intended to deliberately exclude from their contract the printed terms and conditions thereof appearing in paragraphs B and C, oral evidence of other conditions subsequently adopted which are not in conflict with the terms of the instrument which the plaintiff did actually sign is competent. Moreover, the document which was signed by the plaintiff contains certain blank spaces regarding the rated and maximum capacity of the truck, which omissions it was competent to supply by oral evidence. On page 672 of Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) § 441, it is said: "Where the contract is manifestly incomplete, or where an agreement wholly independent of and collateral to the written instrument is entered into, parol evidence is admissible."

On page 668 of the last cited authority, section 439, it is further said: "The general rule is not violated by allowing parol evidence to be given of the contents of a distinct, valid, contemporaneous agreement between the parties which was not reduced to writing, when the same is not in conflict with the provisions of the written agreement."

[9, 10] Assuming that the alleged guaranty of the defendant with respect to the equipment, capacity, and maximum speed of the truck were made subsequent to and distinct from the negotiations which became a part of the actual written contract, oral evidence thereof was competent. The questions as to whether these stipulations were or were not made at the same time, and whether they were made as a part of the transaction represented by the written agreement, were problems for the determination of the jury under the circumstances of this case.

[11] Evidence was adduced over the objection of the defendant to the effect that he guaranteed the truck would carry a load of six cubic yards of gravel or sand from the pit at White Rock to Lincoln, over the highway, at a rate of speed of twenty-eight miles an hour; that this load of material together with the truck weighed approximately 21,000 pounds; that the plaintiff was unable to operate the truck with this load at more than nine miles an hour; that the plaintiff held a contract to haul sixty tons of clay to the pottery; that he was paid $1.75 per ton for hauling the material; that relying on the representations of the defendant he planned to make three round trips per day which would enable him to earn $40 a day, but on account of the substantial decrease in the guaranteed rate of speed his income was materially diminished. The plaintiff testified:

"I expected to make three round trips a day and have six yards to the trip, for which I was paid $1.75 per ton, which would be about $40.00 per day; the distance one way from the pit to the pottery is about thirty-three miles.

"Q. If the International truck that you purchased had been able to pull a six-yard load of gravel, or clay, out of the pit at White Rock, and cover the distance between White Rock or the gravel pit, and the Lincoln pottery, at the rate of 28 miles per hour, how many loads could you have carried per day with that truck? A. Three."

It will be observed the measure of damages upon which the plaintiff relies, was his loss of income based upon his inability to haul three loads of material each day which, together with the truck, weighed approximately 21,000 pounds, over the state highway at a rate of 28 miles an hour. The plaintiff's profit therefore depended upon his violation of section 118 of the California Vehicle Act as it then existed (St. 1927, p. 1439). That section then provided:

"Speed limit for vehicles regulated according to weight and tire equipment.

"(a) In addition to any other regulations imposed by this act it shall be unlawful for the driver of any vehicle, or combination of vehicles, the gross weight of which, including any load thereon is eighteen thousand pounds or more, to drive the same upon a public highway at a speed in excess of twenty miles per hour."

This was clearly a measure of damages based upon a violation of the statute, and therefore incompetent. Objections to this line of evidence should have been sustained. In 17 C. J. p. 797, § 119, it is said: "Loss of profits may not be considered as an element of damages, where the business from which they would have resulted was, or would have been, conducted in violation of law."

It is impossible to determine what proportion of the verdict for damages is based upon this illegal estimated rate of speed. The evidence regarding this measure of damages was clearly erroneous, and requires a reversal of the judgment.

[12] Finally the appellant contends that it was error for the court to award the plaintiff his costs. It is asserted that since the defendant recovered judgment on its cross-complaint for an amount in excess of the damages recovered by the plaintiff, the defendant is entitled to its costs, and the court has no discretion to apportion the costs of suit. The plaintiff recovered judgment for damages for the sum of $1,500. Upon its cross-complaint, for a claim growing out of the same transaction, the defendant recovered judgment for $2,500. In effect, this amounts to a judgment in favor of the defendant for the net sum of $1,000. Judgment should have been entered for this net sum in favor of the defendant. Section 666, Code Civ. Proc.; Poswa v. Jones, 21 Cal. App. 664, 132 P. 629. Since this is not an equitable action, the court had no discretion to apportion costs. The net result of the judgment being favorable to the defendant, it is entitled to an award of its costs of suit. The order taxing costs in favor of the plaintiff was therefore erroneous.

Section 1024 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Costs must be allowed of course to the defendant upon a judgment in his favor in the actions mentioned in section one thousand twenty-two. * * *"

This includes actions "for the recovery of money." Section 666 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "If a counterclaim, established at the trial, exceed the plaintiff's demand, judgment for the defendant must be given for the excess. * * *"

The costs follow the judgment in this case as a matter of course.

The judgment and the order taxing costs are reversed.

GARRISON et al. v. HOGAN et al.

Civ. 7734.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

March 13, 1931.

1. Appeal and error 🔑836.

Reviewing court may at all times direct inquiry toward any showing from record impugning good faith of proceeding.

2. Mines and minerals 🔑78(7).

Complaint to set aside oil lease alleging plaintiffs' ownership of land at all times mentioned and defendants' present claim sufficiently alleged present ownership against general demurrer.

3. Pleading 🔑34(7).

Every permissible construction will be indulged to support judgment against attack on pleadings first made on appeal.

4. Mines and minerals 🔑78(7).

Complaint to set aside oil lease against defendant named and unknown defendants, alleging claims of all defendants were without right, sufficiently alleged named defendant's claim was without right.

Complaint to set aside oil lease in one paragraph set forth list of fictitious defendants whose names were unknown, and in such paragraph alleged that defendants had no right, title, or interest whatever in lands or any part thereof. Complaint further specifically alleged claim of named defendant, and facts thus pleaded showed nature of defendant's claim and that same was without right.

5. Mines and minerals 🔑78(7).

Complaint to set aside oil lease for breach by lessee held not insufficient for failure to allege lease contained forfeiture clause.

6. Mines and minerals ⇨78(7).

Complaint to set aside oil lease for breach of provision requiring drilling held sufficient to support judgment of forfeiture.

> Complaint alleged that owners of property leased premises to defendants under lease requiring lessee to start drilling for oil with adequate equipment within fifteen days from time lessee was furnished with policy and to continue drilling; that lessee was furnished with required policy, but failed to start drilling; that such refusal continued for period in excess of time requirements of lease; and that demand for surrender of premises and notification of forfeiture was given.

7. Appeal and error ⇨991, 1008(1).

Whether policy given lessee of oil lands was sufficient was question of fact determined by findings in action to set aside lease.

> Defendant in action to set aside oil lease relied in answer on plaintiffs' ownership and her rights thereunder as lessee, but claimed that policy of insurance issued to her pursuant to requirements of lease was insufficient and not as contemplated by lease. Complaint recited receipt of policy by lessee, which receipt stated that policy was in complete satisfaction of demands of lease.

8. Mines and minerals ⇨78(7).

Plaintiffs separately owning adjoining tracts, but leasing same under single instrument for oil development, were properly joined as plaintiffs in suit to set aside lease (Code Civ. Proc. § 378).

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

The present appeal comes before us on the judgment roll alone. The only questions presented go to the sufficiency of the complaint and the sufficiency of the findings made, following, as the findings do, the facts alleged in the said complaint. It is to be noted that the briefs of counsel filed herein indicate a desire to argue everything except the points in issue. Although much of the argument is directed toward matters not before us for determination, nevertheless the persistency of the claims advanced does serve to accentuate a condition which might be inferred from the record properly before us.

[1] Plaintiffs were the owners of certain lands in this state. These lands appeared to be chiefly valuable on account of the oil deposits thought to be contained therein. A lease of the lands was made to the defendants with the object of exploration and development. The defendants seemingly violated the terms of the lease and thwarted the objects thereof. Other developments were made adjacent to the lands in question which as a matter of common knowledge impaired or would impair the value of these lands in the event of continued inactivity. Plaintiffs then commenced this action, the main purpose of which was to remove the defendant's claim. A process server called at the house of the defendant, Felicia Hogan, and made service of the complaint and summons upon a person then and there claiming to be the defendant. No appearance being made, plaintiff caused to be entered the default of the said defendant, now appellant, and proceeded to judgment. Thereafter said defendant made a sufficient showing to the effect that the person actually served was another person and procured an order setting aside the default. Upon the entry of such order defendant filed her answer herein, and thereafter the matter was set down for trial. When the case was called defendant moved for a continuance upon various grounds, the motion being based upon affidavits. Plaintiffs offered counteraffidavits, and the continuance was denied. Thereupon counsel for defendant withdrew from the case declaring his unwillingness to proceed further, and the court proceeded to hear the proof offered by plaintiffs and after consideration thereof the judgment complained of was entered. Much of the foregoing appears from the record before us, though not strictly speaking a part of the judgment roll. Yet counsel have been assiduous and untiring in their efforts to get this situation before the court; therefore it is meet that they should know their efforts were not unavailing. And, further explanatory, counsel for each party has been equally persistent, though from different motives. Plaintiffs desire this phase of the case known in order to support their claim here that the appeal is purely for delay; defendant, upon the same showing, urges her claim for justice in that she has never had a hearing on the merits. It might be noted that no complaint is made of the action of the trial court in denying the motion for a continuance; that is to say, the action of the trial court in that behalf is not brought before us for review. While, as indicated, the foregoing recital may be deemed to an extent remote from the questions presented through the judgment roll, yet the inquiry of a reviewing court may at all times be directed toward any showing made from the entire record which may impugn the good faith of the proceeding. And further, from their record as a whole, may be disclosed the gravamen of the injury claimed by the errors complained of. We may now consider the pleadings and the findings thereon.

Plaintiffs in their complaint allege: That at all of the times therein mentioned they were the owners of the property described. That on January 26, 1926, the plaintiffs made, executed, and delivered to defendant Felicia M. Hogan (appellant herein) a lease to the said property. That the lease contained a provision that the lessee was to start the drilling for oil on the demised premises by spudding in with adequate equipment within fifteen days from the time she was furnished with a policy written by the Title Insurance & Trust Company and to continue the drilling of such well, etc. That on July 19, 1926, the plaintiffs furnished the policy required, insuring the lessee as to her rights to operate under the lease and the said defendant by written receipt acknowledged the said policy as being in conformity with the terms of the lease. That the defendant has failed, refused, and neglected to start drilling or any work on the property, and that such refusal has been and is for a period in excess of the time requirements of the lease; that in this connection demand has been made for a surrender of the premises and a notification of forfeiture. That the said defendant notwithstanding claims an interest in the property adverse to plaintiffs. Plaintiffs then set forth a number of John Does and Doe partnerships, and plaintiffs pray that the lease be canceled; that defendant be required to appear and set forth her claims; and that the court declare said claims invalid and enjoin a further assertion thereof. Defendant Felicia M. Hogan appeared and answered. In her answer she admits her failure to commence or begin drilling, and alleges that other persons are in possession of the property, and that the bond or policy given her was not in compliance with the requirements of the lease. She asserts her claim of interest in and to the property and asserts the same to be adverse to the rights of plaintiffs. Appellant attacks the sufficiency of the complaint on numerous grounds, each of which may be taken up as urged.

[2, 3] First, it is claimed no cause of action is stated for the reason that there is no allegation that plaintiffs were the owners of the property at the time of filing the complaint, the allegation being that "at all of the times herein mentioned" plaintiffs were the owners, etc. However, the complaint, in a succeeding paragraph, sets forth that defendants now claim an interest adverse to the rights of plaintiffs. The allegation that plaintiffs were at all of the times mentioned in the complaint the owners of the property, coupled with the allegations of defendant's present claim and her present and continuing failure of performance under the terms of the lease, and that such present claim and continuing failure are adverse to the rights of plaintiffs, taken as a whole, sufficiently allege a present ownership as against a general demurrer. And particularly is this true where, after trial had, judgment has been entered. The theory being that in such a case every permissible and logically possible construction will be indulged to support the judgment as against an attack made here for the first time.

[4] Next appellant urges that there is no allegation that defendant's claims are without right. The complaint in one paragraph sets forth a list of fictitious defendants whose names are unknown, with the usual prayer for permission to insert the true names when ascertained. Continuing along in said paragraph is the allegation "that the said defendants and neither of them, have any estate, right, title or interest whatever in or to said lands or premises or any part thereof." Appellant contends, in this connection, that the allegation is restricted to the fictitious defendants, and that by no stretch of construction can it supply the lack of averment concerning the quality of defendant's claim. The complaint, however, specifically pleads the claim of defendant, and the facts thus pleaded show the nature of defendant's claim and that the same is without right. The claim of appellant, when analyzed, is that the pleader should have more skilfully paragraphed the complaint so that the general allegation, rather than appearing as a distinct sentence in the paragraph which included the Doe defendants, should have been the subject of an independent paragraph. In the caption of the complaint the appellant is named as a defendant and in every allegation of the complaint, save the one referred to, she is likewise so named. We find no merit in the contention. Morton v. Shannon, 26 Cal. App. 689, 147 P. 1179; also 21 Cal. Jur. 58, and cases thereunder cited. We can and do hold that the complaint on this issue practically alleged that the defendant appellant claimed some interest in the lands, and that a number of defendants whose names were unknown also made similar claim or separate claim, and that the claims of all of the defendants were without right. And further plaintiff pleaded specifically the facts upon which it alleged the claim of defendant rested and if those allegations were true, as they are presumed to be, it showed affirmatively the wrongfulness of defendant's claim.

[5, 6] Another contention of the appellant is that the complaint does not allege that the lease contained a forfeiture clause, and, in the absence of such a clause, plaintiffs are entitled to no relief. The subject is fully discussed in the case of Hall v. Augur, 82 Cal. App. 594, 256 P. 232. The settled law of this and other jurisdictions is therein announced and a reading of the case with the authorities therein cited will disclose the utter lack of merit in this contention of the appellant. See, also, the following: 1 Thornton on Oil & Gas, pages 155, 398; Indiana Oil, Gas & D. Co. v. McCrory, 42 Okl. 136, 140 P. 610, and Patsy Oil & Gas Co. v. Baker, 127 Okl. 76, 259 P. 864. And whether or not the lease itself contained any specific provision for forfeiture, sufficient facts are alleged which would support a judgment of forfeiture.

[7] And so on throughout, each ground of appeal goes to some claimed defect in the complaint urged from a restricted viewpoint and upon an isolated fragment of the pleading. We have examined all of these grounds of complaint and find nothing of sufficient merit to warrant a disturbance of the judgment. It must be remembered that defendant appellant answered, and in that answer relied upon the ownership of plaintiffs and her rights thereunder as a lessee. Her only claim of right was that the policy of insurance issued to her, pursuant to the requirements of the lease, was insufficient and not such as contemplated by the lease itself. This was her only defense, and the complaint recited her own receipt and the recitals therein to the effect that said policy was in complete satisfaction of the demands of the lease. Obviously, under the pleadings, issue being joined, this question became one of fact determined by the findings which were against the contention of the defendant.

[8] Finally, appellant complains that plaintiffs are not united in interest, as it is alleged that the plaintiffs own individually two separate parcels of land, that is, one plaintiff owns one parcel and the coplaintiff is the sole owner of the second parcel. The lease is a single instrument reciting the several ownerships in the two separate parcels. There appears enough in the complaint to clearly indicate that, while the plaintiffs Garrison each owned a separate lot, the two constituting the premises leased, yet the intention was to treat the lots as one parcel, and the very terms and intent of the lease was that the conditions named therein were for the equal benefit of each parcel. No point in or on either parcel was designated for the commencement of operations, and, the lots being adjoining, it is obvious that with the underlying motive of the transaction being oil development the exploration on one tract would inure equally to the benefit of the other. And, under the terms of the lease, could defendant have shown that she had commenced operations on one lot she would have shown a complete compliance with the terms of the lease and thereby would have held the other lot subject to the terms thereof. Section 378 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "All persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs who have an interest in the subject of the action or in whom any right to relief in respect to or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally or in the alternative, where if such persons brought separate actions any question of law or fact would arise which are common to all the parties. * * *" The instant case comes clearly within the terms of that section.

Passing from the complaint to the findings, we are met with the same contentions. What has been said completely covers the objections urged as against the sufficiency of the findings to sustain the judgment. We therefore conclude that the appeal is completely lacking in merit and to an extent that the proceeding in this court might well be classed as frivolous and vexatious. No claim of defect in pleading was urged in the court below, and, when the cause was there called for trial, counsel for appellant, when and where full opportunity afforded itself to urge these identical matters as are urged here, abandoned the case and refused to proceed at all. Early in our jurisprudence the rule was announced that the failure of a complaint to state any cause of action could be urged at every stage of the proceeding. That such a point could be urged for the first time on appeal, and, if sustained, would overthrow all that preceded. It was found, however, that such a rule, in its most strict interpretation, would afford means of working severe injustice. And so, while not abrogated, it has been somewhat relaxed. California Jurisprudence, volume 2, at page 257, sets forth the attitude of the courts as follows: "The courts are not inclined to look favorably upon objections to the pleadings specifically made for the first time upon appeal, where upon suggestion before trial, the defect could have been easily overcome. And they will in aid of the judgment, therefore, give the complaint as favorable an interpretation as its general scope will permit." An interesting case, illustrative of this inclination of the courts, is Penrose v. Winter, 135 Cal. 289, 67 P. 772. In the instant case no demurrer was interposed and issue was joined only after the opening of a default which had been entered with the apparent knowledge of defendant, and that throughout the entire controversy it was appellant's desire and aim to obstruct rather than facilitate a disposition of the issues presented.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARKS, J.

Appellant filed her complaint in the court below seeking judgment against defendants for money. The complaint contains four causes of action separately stated. The first is based upon the violation of what has become known as the "right of privacy." The other three causes of action are based upon a supposed property right in incidents of her life and her maiden name. Respondents filed general and special demurrers to each count of the complaint which were sustained. Appellant refused to amend, and appealed from the judgment entered after the right to amend had expired. Respondents make no point on their special demurrers, and the sole question to be decided upon this appeal is whether or not causes of action are stated.

It is alleged that appellant's maiden name was Gabrielle Darley; that a number of years ago she was a prostitute and was tried for murder, the trial resulting in her acquittal; that during the year 1918, and after her acquittal, she abandoned her life of shame and became entirely rehabilitated; that during the year 1919 she married Bernard Melvin and commenced the duties of caring for their home, and thereafter at all times lived an exemplary, virtuous, honorable, and righteous life; that she assumed a place in respectable society, and made many friends who were not aware of the incidents of her earlier life; that during the month of July, 1925, the defendants, without her permission, knowledge, or consent, made, photographed, produced, and released a moving picture film entitled "The Red Kimono," and thereafter exhibited it in moving picture houses in California, Arizona, and throughout many other states; that this moving picture was based upon the true story of the past life of appellant, and that her maiden name, Gabrielle Darley, was used therein; that defendants featured and advertised that the plot of the film was the true story of the unsavory incidents in the life of appellant; that Gabrielle Darley was the true name of the principal character; and that Gabrielle Darley was appellant; that by the production and showing of the picture, friends of appellant learned for the first time of the unsavory incidents of her early life. This caused them to scorn and abandon her, and exposed her to obloquy, contempt, and ridicule, causing her grievous mental and physical suffering to her damage in the sum of $50,000. These allegations were set forth in the first cause of action. It will not be necessary to detail the other three causes of action which are based upon an invasion of a supposed property right.

The law of privacy is of recent origin. It was first discussed in an essay published in a law journal in 1860. It did not gain prominence or notice of the bench or bar until an article appeared in 4 Harvard Law Review, p. 193, written by the Honorable Louis D. Brandeis in collaboration with Samuel D. Warren. Since the publication of this article, a number of cases have arisen in various states involving the so-called doctrine of the right of privacy. It is recognized in some jurisdictions, while others have refused to put it into effect.

A reading of most of the decisions in jurisdictions recognizing this right leaves the mind impressed with the lack of uniformity in the reasoning employed by the various jurists supporting it. Most of the cases turn upon questions of breaches of contracts, either express or implied, such as the breach of an implied contract on the part of a photographer to print only such pictures as may be ordered by his subject, and not to print others and use them for purposes of advertising. Others are based upon the breach of a trust or confidence which one placed in or gave to another. Others recognize a property right in private letters and private writings which will not permit their publication without consent. In others, the publication is so nearly akin to a libel that the final conclusions could be supported under the law of libel without invoking the doctrine of the right of privacy. In practically all jurisdictions in which this right is not recognized, the decisions are based upon the lack of a statute giving the plaintiff the right to protect a likeness or an incident of life, since the ancient common law did not recognize any such right. In the leading case of Roberson v. Rochester Folding-Box Co., 171 N. Y. 538, 64 N. E. 442, 59 L. R. A. 478, 89 Am. St. Rep. 828, the decision was based upon the lack of any statutory enactment giving a cause of action to protect such a right and the failure of the common law to recognize it. Shortly after this decision was handed down the Legislature of New York enacted a law prohibiting the publication of a person's likeness, or the story of, or incidents in, his life, without his consent, for purposes of advertisement or gain. Since 1903, when this legislation was enacted, practically all of the New York cases are based upon it, and are therefore of little assistance to us here.

The question is a new one in California. The only case to which we have been cited which even remotely relates to it is that of Crane v. Heine, 35 Cal. App. 466, 170 P. 433. This case, however, furnishes us with no authority for adopting in this state the doctrine of the right of privacy as it is known in other jurisdictions.

No good purpose could be gained by reviewing in detail the many decisions from other jurisdictions in which this right has been discussed. For those who may be studiously inclined and who desire to pursue this question further we cite the following cases from courts which have both adopted, and refused to accept, the doctrine of the right of privacy: Monson v. Tussaud, [1894] I. Q. B. 671; Prince Albert v. Strange, 1 Macu. & G. 25; Dockrell v. Dougall, 80 L. T. (N. S.) 556; Clark v. Freeman, 11 Beav. 112; Pollard v. Photographic Co., L. R. 40 Ch. The right of privacy as recognized in a number of states has been defined as follows: "The right of privacy may be defined as the right to live one's life in seclusion, without being subjected to unwarranted and undesired publicity. In short, it is the right to be let alone. 21 R. C. L. 1197, 1198. There are times, however, when one, whether willingly or not, becomes an actor in an occurrence of public or general interest. When this takes place, he emerges from his seclusion, and it is not an invasion of his right of privacy to publish his photograph with an account of such occurrence." Jones v. Herald Post Co., supra.

A few general principles, founded on authority or reason, seem to run through most of the better considered decisions from the jurisdictions which recognize the doctrine as well as those which do not. We may summarize them as follows:

(1) The right of privacy was unknown to the ancient common law.

(2) It is an incident of the person and not of property—a tort for which a right of recovery is given in some jurisdictions.

(3) It is a purely personal action, and does not survive, but dies with the person.

(4) It does not exist where the person has published the matter complained of, or consented thereto.

(5) It does not exist where a person has become so prominent that by his very prominence he has dedicated his life to the public, and thereby waived his right to privacy. There can be no privacy in that which is already public.

(6) It does not exist in the dissemination of news and news events, nor in the discussion of events of the life of a person in whom the public has a rightful interest, nor where the information would be of public benefit, as in the case of a candidate for public office.

(7) The right of privacy can only be violated by printings, writings, pictures, or other permanent publications or reproductions, and not by word of mouth.

(8) The right of action accrues when the publication is made for gain or profit. (This, however, is questioned in some cases.)

[1] From the foregoing it follows as a natural consequence that the use of the incidents from the life of appellant in the moving picture is in itself not actionable. These incidents appeared in the records of her trial for murder, which is a public record, open to the perusal of all. The very fact that they were contained in a public record is sufficient to negative the idea that their publication was a violation of a right of privacy. When the incidents of a life are so public as to be spread upon a public record, they come within the knowledge and into the possession of the public and cease to be private. Had respondents, in the story of "The Red Kimono," stopped with the use of those incidents from the life of appellant which were spread upon the record of her trial, no right of action would have accrued. They went further, and in the formation of the plot used the true maiden name of appellant. If any right of action exists, it arises from the use of this true name in connection with the true incidents from her life together with their advertisements in which they stated that the story of the picture was taken from true incidents in the life of Gabrielle Darley, who was Gabrielle Darley Melvin.

[2] In the absence of any provision of law, we would be loath to conclude that the right of privacy as the foundation for an action in tort, in the form known and recognized in other jurisdictions, exists in California. We find, however, that the fundamental law of our state contains provisions which, we believe, permit us to recognize the right to pursue and obtain safety and happiness without improper infringements thereon by others.

Section 1 of article 1 of the Constitution of California provides as follows: "All men are by nature free and independent, and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty; acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; and pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness."

The right to pursue and obtain happiness is guaranteed to all by the fundamental law of our state. This right by its very nature includes the right to live free from the unwarranted attack of others upon one's liberty, property, and reputation. Any person living a life of rectitude has that right to happiness which includes a freedom from unnecessary attacks on his character, social standing, or reputation.

The use of appellant's true name in connection with the incidents of her former life in the plot and advertisements was unnecessary and indelicate, and a willful and wanton disregard of that charity which should actuate us in our social intercourse, and which should keep us from unnecessarily holding another up to the scorn and contempt of upright members of society.

[3] Upon demurrer, the allegations of the complaint must be taken as true. We must therefore conclude that eight years before the production of "The Red Kimono" appellant had abandoned her life of shame, had rehabilitated herself, and had taken her place as a respected and honored member of society. This change having occurred in her life, she should have been permitted to continue its course without having her reputation and social standing destroyed by the publication of the story of her former depravity with no other excuse than the expectation of private gain by the publishers.

One of the major objectives of society as it is now constituted, and of the administration of our penal system, is the rehabilitation of the fallen and the reformation of the criminal. Under these theories of sociology, it is our object to lift up and sustain the unfortunate rather than tear him down. Where a person has by his own efforts rehabilitated himself, we, as right-thinking members of society, should permit him to continue in the path of rectitude rather than throw him back into a life of shame or crime. Even the thief on the cross was permitted to repent during the hours of his final agony.

[4] We believe that the publication by respondents of the unsavory incidents in the past life of appellant after she had reformed, coupled with her true name, was not justified by any standard of morals or ethics known to us, and was a direct invasion of her inalienable right guaranteed to her by our Constitution, to pursue and obtain happiness. Whether we call this a right of privacy or give it any other name is immaterial, because it is a right guaranteed by our Constitution that must not be ruthlessly and needlessly invaded by others. We are of the opinion that the first cause of action of appellant's complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against respondents.

[5] As we have observed, the other causes of action of the complaint are based upon a supposed property right in her name and in the incidents of her life. We have found no authorities sustaining such a property right in the story of one's life. Appellant's cause of action must rest on tort and tort alone. The general demurrer was properly sustained to the second, third, and fourth causes of action.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to overrule respondents' demurrers to the first cause of action of the complaint and permit them to answer should they be so advised.

This appeal from a judgment quieting title, being based upon the judgment roll alone, does not permit consideration of alleged errors in the admission of evidence, of alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, or of the alleged omission to make findings, but confines consideration to the single question as to sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment. 2 Cal. WILKINSON v. ZUMWALT.

Civ. 4187.

District Court of Appeal, Third District. California.

March 9, 1931.

1. Attorney and client ⚷72.

Administrator's letter to attorney, merely accepting prospective buyer's offer for intestate's negotiable reclamation district warrants, was no authority for district's secretary to deliver warrants to attorney.

Evidence disclosed that administrator had never placed any funds of estate in hands of attorney or authorized him to collect any moneys of estate; that there was nothing to show that attorney was either actual or ostensible agent of administrator; that reclamation district's secretary, merely on basis of letter in question, delivered warrants to attorney who thereupon transferred them to buyer without indorsement, notwithstanding they were made payable to order of intestate; and that buyer made check for warrants payable directly to attorney at his request.

2. Attorney and client ⚷72.

Evidence supported finding that administrator's attorney was unauthorized to obtain intestate's negotiable reclamation district warrants and sell them, making buyer liable therefor to administrator (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 283, 1517, 1523; Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3111).

It appeared that buyer, when attorney delivered warrants in question to him, noticed they were payable to order of intestate, but he took the warrants without any indorsement, and made check payable to attorney at the attorney's request. Code Civ. Proc. § 283 specifies authority of attorney, and sections 1517, 1523 relate to sales of personal property by administrators. Civ. Code, § 3082, defines negotiable instruments, and section 3111 provides that negotiable instrument payable to order is negotiated by holder's indorsement.

Parts of finding which do not affect legal rights of parties may be disregarded as surplusage.

4. Executors and administrators 🔑432.

That administrator might be liable to heirs for intestate's warrants unauthorizedly sold by administrator's attorney is no defense for buyer in suit by administrator (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 283, 1517, 1523; Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3111).

5. Executors and administrators 🔑80.

Since authority of administrator to sell intestate's personalty is limited, he cannot authorize attorney to sell negotiable warrants in his stead (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 283, 1517, 1523; Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3111).

6. Attorney and client 🔑98.

Administrator's attorney, being unauthorized to sell intestate's reclamation district warrants, held unauthorized to receive payment, justifying administrator's recovery from buyer (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 283, 1517, 1523; Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3111).

Buyer of unindorsed reclamation district warrants payable to order of intestate held charged with knowledge of statutes defining negotiability and requiring indorsement (Civ. Code, §§ 3082, 3111).

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by William P. Wilkinson, as administrator of the estate of J. F. Wilkinson, deceased, against I. G. Zumwalt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

See, also, 291 P. 869.

U. W. Brown, of Colusa, for appellant.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendant for the return of 119 warrants of reclamation district No. 2047, or the value thereof, in the event that the return of the warrants could not be had. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The findings made by the trial court establish the following facts: That J. F. Wilkinson, deceased, died on or about the 23d day of January, 1924, in the county of Colusa, state of California, of which county he was then a resident; that on February 25, 1924, William P. Wilkinson was appointed the administrator of the estate of J. F. Wilkinson, deceased, and letters of administration were issued to him; and that ever since said 25th day of February, 1924, the plaintiff has been the administrator of the estate of said deceased; that at the time of the death of the said J. F. Wilkinson, the decedent was the owner of 119 warrants issued by reclamation district No. 2047; that said warrants were negotiable instruments and were issued payable to the order of J. F. Wilkinson; that thereafter, and on or about the 16th day of July, 1928, one Charles K. Atran, an attorney at law who was acting as attorney for the plaintiff herein, as administrator of the estate of said deceased, presented to the superior court of the county of Colusa a petition on behalf of said administrator praying for an order authorizing the plaintiff, as such administrator, to sell the warrants hereinbefore referred to; that at said time said warrants were in the possession of the secretary of reclamation district No. 2047; that said warrants had not been indorsed by this plaintiff, nor at any time have said warrants, or any of them, been indorsed by this plaintiff; that the plaintiff did not authorize or direct the said Charles K. Atran to obtain possession of said warrants, or of any of them, from the secretary of said reclamation district, for the purpose of sale or delivery to the defendant herein, nor did he indorse said warrants, or any of them, to said Atran for any purpose; that on the 16th day of July, 1928, the court made an order authorizing the plaintiff, as such administrator, to sell said warrants at private sale, and thereafter, and on the same day, Charles K. Atran, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, obtained possession of said 119 warrants and delivered them to the defendant herein, and defendant paid to said Atran the sum of $1,514.70; that said plaintiff did not, at any time, authorize said delivery of said warrants, or any of them, to the defendant, nor did said plaintiff receive said sum of $1,514.70, or any part thereof.

The court further found that the plaintiff did not sell said warrants; did not convey or deliver the same to the defendant; and that no sale of said warrants had been confirmed by the court. The court further found that the plaintiff did not know of the delivery of said warrants to the defendant until several months thereafter, and that on or about the 15th day of June, 1929, the plaintiff made a demand upon the defendant for the return of said warrants. The description of the warrants contained in the findings not being necessary for the purposes of this decision, such description is omitted.

[1] Upon this appeal the appellant contends that as Atran was an attorney for the plaintiff as administrator of the estate of J. F. Wilkinson, deceased, he was the agent of the plaintiff, and that any loss suffered by the plaintiff or the estate of J. F. Wilkinson by reason of Atran's derelictions or defalcations, must be borne by the plaintiff. It may be stated here that a search of the record fails to disclose that the plaintiff ever placed any funds of the estate in the hands of attorney Atran, or authorized him to collect any moneys belonging to the estate; that there is nothing in the record to show that Atran was either an actual or ostensible agent of the plaintiff. All that the record shows is substantially as follows: That attorney Atran had some negotiations with the defendant relative to the purchase of the warrants involved in this action, and that the defendant offered to buy the same, and pay therefor 80 cents on the dollar for the original warrants and 60 cents on the dollar for the interest warrants; that Atran communicated this offer to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff wrote Atran that he would accept the defendant's offer of 80 cents for the original warrants and 60 cents for the interest warrants. Thereafter, on July 16, 1928, the defendant gave to Atran his personal check for the sum of $1,514.70, payable to the order of Charles K. Atran, and attorney Atran obtained possession of said warrants and delivered the same to the defendant; that said warrants were made payable to the order of J. F. Wilkinson, then deceased, and were delivered by Atran to the defendant without any indorsement thereon. The record shows that the warrants, in the condition which we have just stated, were brought to the office of the defendant by Atran and delivered to him, and that the check was made payable to attorney Atran at the request of said Atran. The letter from the plaintiff to Atran, relative to the acceptance of the defendant's offer to purchase the warrants, is in the following language: "Yours of the 10th received regarding the warrants. I will accept the offer of Mr. Zumwalt, 80 for the originals and 60 for the others. I trust we may now proceed to final settlement without further delay. Sincerely yours, William P. Wilkinson." At the time of the writing of this letter, the warrants were in the possession of the secretary of reclamation district No. 2047. The secretary, without any order from the plaintiff as administrator of the estate of J. F. Wilkinson, delivered said warrants to Attorney Atran. The answer of the secretary upon what authority he delivered the warrants to Atran is in the following words: "Why, Mr. Atran showed me a letter from Mr. Wilkinson whereby he had agreed to accept a certain price for the warrants, and I knew, from what had been going on in the office, they had been negotiating for the sale for some time, so when he called for them I gave them to him." It requires no argument to show that this letter did not authorize the delivery of the warrant by the secretary to Mr. Atran.

A certain letter introduced in evidence written by Mr. William P. Wilkinson, in relation to the warrants and as to where they should be placed, is as follows: "* * * In reply I told him I expected to be called over to Colusa most any day, and asked him to keep them there until I came. So the warrants are at the office over there. If you will get them and turn them over to the Colusa County Bank, it will save sending them here and back again. You can then have them issue the interest warrants covering the original ones." No other letter or authorization with regard to the disposition of the warrants or where they should be placed appears to have been made by the plaintiff.

The defendant testified that when the warrants were delivered to him by Atran he looked at the warrants and observed that they were made payable to J. F. Wilkinson, and that he took the warrants without their having been indorsed by the administrator of the estate, and that he made the check in payment of the warrants to Atran, at Atran's request. The letter which we have just quoted did authorize Atran to obtain possession of the warrants for a limited purpose, to-wit, to deliver them to the Colusa County Bank, the evident purpose being that the warrants should remain there until the plaintiff, whose residence was in Placerville, should go to Colusa, call at the bank and endorse the same.

Upon this appeal the appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court that said warrants were in possession of the secretary of the district on the 16th day of July, 1928, the secretary testifying that he thought the warrants were delivered after Atran had showed him a letter from Wilkinson which he thought was dated July 13, 1928. This is the letter in which the plaintiff had stated that he would accept an offer of 80 cents for the original warrants and 60 cents on the dollar for the interest warrants. This testimony, of course, is utterly insufficient to support the claim of the appellant that the finding of the court is unsupported. The mere matter of whether the warrants remained in possession of the secretary until the 16th day of July, 1928, is wholly immaterial, as it is evident by the testimony of the secretary that he had the warrants in his possession until the letter dated July 13, 1928, was exhibited to him. The matter of the dates in no wise affects the substance of the finding.

[2, 3] The finding of the court that the plaintiff did not authorize or direct the said Charles K. Atran to obtain possession of said warrants, or any of them, from the secretary of said reclamation district for the purposes of sale or delivery to the defendant herein, nor did he indorse said warrants, or any of them, to said Atran for any purpose, is challenged by the appellant as not being supported by the evidence. The evidence which we have set forth, however, conclusively shows that Atran was not authorized to obtain possession of the warrants, or any of them, for the purpose of delivery to the defendant. That he was authorized to obtain the warrants and deposit them in the Colusa County Bank is shown by the record. The words in the record, "nor did he endorse said warrants, or any of them, for any purpose," may be disregarded as surplusage, as they do not affect the legal rights of the parties involved in this action. At no time was Atran ever authorized to sell or deliver to any purchaser the warrants involved in this action. The finding of the court that the plaintiff never sold or delivered any of the warrants to the defendant is likewise challenged. A review of what we have hereinbefore set forth shows clearly that this assignment is without merit. There is no pretense anywhere that the plaintiff ever made any sale or authorized any one to make any sale, or ever indorsed the warrants to any one, which indorsement was necessary to transfer the title to the property.

Section 283 of the Code of Civil Procedure specifies the authority that may be exercised by an attorney and counsellor at law, to wit, to bind his client in any of the steps of an action or proceeding by his agreement filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes of the court, and not otherwise, to receive money claimed by his client in an action or proceeding during the pendency thereof, or after judgment, etc. Nothing of this kind appears in the record before us. The attorney was not acting in any proceeding in court, and he was not collecting any money due upon any judgment. The purchaser of the warrants in question, as shown by his own testimony, knew that the warrants were made and drawn in favor of J. F. Wilkinson, deceased, and that in order to transfer title they should be indorsed by William P. Wilkinson, as administrator of the estate of J. F. Wilkinson, deceased, and yet, notwithstanding this fact, he not only accepted the warrants without indorsement, but drew his check in favor of the attorney, and not in favor of the administrator of the estate.

[4] The appellant calls our attention to the case of In re Ogier's Estate, 101 Cal. 381, quoting from page 385, 35 P. 900, 901, 40 Am. St. Rep. 61, where it is said: "Every executor and administrator is chargeable in his account with the whole of the estate of the decedent which may come into his possession, * * * and while, in the settlement of his account, he will be allowed all necessary expenses in the care, management, and settlement of the estate, including reasonable fees paid to attorneys for conducting the necessary proceedings or suits in courts, * * * still, such allowance can be made only to him, and not to the attorney. * * * And if the attorney employed should be derelict in his duty, and should receive and misappropriate funds of the estate, the executor would be liable therefor to the legatees under the will." We may admit the correctness of this statement, but its application to the instant case is an entirely different matter. The fact that the administrator of the estate of J. F. Wilkinson might be liable to the heirs of J. F. Wilkinson for the value of these warrants does not relieve the defendant from his liability for having wrongfully and unlawfully obtained possession of the same. Having bought the warrants with his eyes open, without any indorsement from the administrator of the estate, and having paid some one wholly unauthorized to receive the money, the fact that the administrator might be liable for the value of the warrants when he comes to deliver the estate to the heirs of J. F. Wilkinson, deceased, is no defense to this action.

[5] In Woerner v. Woerner, 171 Cal. 298, 152 P. 919, we find the following relative to the power of an attorney: "An attorney has no general authority to act for his client. His stipulation for a disposition of his client's property cannot bind the client, if the attorney had no legal authority to make it; at least not unless it is acted on by the court and carried into the judgment"—citing authorities. The authority of the administrator being limited, we do not need to cite authorities to the effect that the administrator could not authorize any one to act in his stead or in his capacity.

Section 1517 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relative to the sale of personal property, is pertinent here. It reads: "All sales of property must be under oath, reported to and confirmed by the court, before the title to the property passes." Section 1523, Code of Civil Procedure, relative to sales of personal property, reads: "Any such sale shall take effect only upon confirmation by the court, except in the sale of stocks or bonds when the court has, upon a verified petition previously presented, made its order authorizing the sale and transfer thereof, and fixing the terms and conditions upon which the same is to be made."

[6] Not having any authority to sell, the conclusion is inevitable that attorney Atran had no authority to receive payment from the defendant. There is nothing in the record indicating that the plaintiff ever gave or intended to give Attorney Atran any ostensible authority to act as his agent in the sale of the warrants, or to receive payment therefor. The appellant has not introduced in evidence any testimony indicating the existence of any such ostensible agency, or tending in any particular to show that he was misled by any act of the plaintiff. The defendant simply took the unindorsed warrants, as we have stated, and drew his check in favor of the attorney, instead of in favor of the administrator of the estate.

That the appellant in this action, by reason of his misplaced confidence, has lost the sum of $1,514.70, does not entitle him to reimbursement from the estate of the deceased, or from the administrator thereof.

[7] The defendant in this case was chargeable with knowledge of section 3082, Civil Code, defining negotiable instruments, and also with the provisions of section 3111, Civil Code, providing that, if a negotiable instrument is payable to order, it is negotiated by the indorsement of the holder, and that in this case, the owner being deceased, it was necessary for the warrants to bear the indorsement of the legal representative of the deceased.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. PICKWICK STAGES SYSTEM et al.

WILLIAMS v. PICKWICK STAGES SYSTEM et al. (PACIFIC INDEMNITY CO., Intervener).

Civ. 353, 354.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 16, 1931.

1. Automobiles 🔑244(12, 35).

Evidence established negligence of driver of stage in driving stage colliding with automobile at high rate of speed into left-hand curve on left-hand side of highway (St. 1923, p. 557, §§ 122, 125, subd. c).

2. Automobiles 🔑244(36).

Evidence established that negligence of stage driver in driving stage into automobile was proximate cause of collision between automobiles.

The evidence disclosed that the collision between the passenger stage being driven at high rate of speed into left-hand curve on left-hand side of highway and the automobile caused the automobile to swerve into the bank on side of highway, and then carom off from bank into the road and into the automobile of the plaintiff suing the stage company.

3. Automobiles 🔑245(79).

Contributory negligence of motorist in not stopping before collision with automobile after its impact with negligently driven passenger stage held for jury.

4. Automobiles 🔑246(48).

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision, instruction regarding right to drive on left-hand side of highway held justified by evidence (St. 1923, p. 557, § 122).

The court instructed that a vehicle might be driven on left-hand side of public highway when it was overtaking and passing another vehicle, but that, in that event, it must not be driven on the left-hand side of the highway, unless the left-hand side was unobstructed for at least 100 yards ahead. The evidence strongly indicated that at the time the passenger stage started to pass automobile in which plaintiffs suing for personal injuries were riding the automobile struck by the stage was not 300 feet distant from the stage.

5. Automobiles 🔑246(48).

Instruction in action for injuries sustained in automobile collision regarding passing vehicles on curve held justified by evidence (St. 1923, p. 557, § 125, subd. c).

The court instructed that The State Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 557, § 125, subd. c) provided that a driver of a motor vehicle should not drive the same so as to pass or overtake any vehicle going in the same direction on a curve where the driver's view along the highway was obstructed within a distance of 150 feet. The evidence indicated that at the point driver of defendant's stage attempted to pass plaintiffs' automobile the highway made a curve to the left so that a driver could not see down the road a distance of 150 feet; his view being obstructed by bank on the side of the road.

MARKS, J.

Arlo F. Williams and Geraldine E. Williams are husband and wife. On the 28th day of August, 1927, they were riding in an automobile easterly on a public highway between the cities of Fillmore and Piru in Ventura county. The automobile came into collision with a Ford being driven by Jose Reynoso. Both Mr. and Mrs. Williams suffered serious bodily injuries, and the car, which belonged to Arlo F. Williams, was demolished. They brought separate actions for damages, which were tried together, and which resulted in a judgment in favor of Geraldine E. Williams in the sum of $5.000, and Arlo F. Williams in the sum of $2,000. The Pacific Indemnity Company, a corporation, was the insurance carrier on the car of Mr. Williams. This company intervened in his action so that it might be subrogated to the amount expended by it for repairs to the automobile in any judgment rendered in his favor.

The accident happened about 8 o'clock at night at a point on the highway where the pavement was 16 feet in width, with shoulders on each side of about 6 feet. On the northerly side there was a bank from 8 to 10 feet high. At the point of the accident, and for a considerable distance on each side thereof, the road travels in a sweeping "S" curve.

The automobile in which the respondents were riding was traveling in an easterly direction. A stage, belonging to the Pickwick Stages System, a corporation, and driven by P. C. Madsen, was traveling in the same direction. It passed the Williams car and proceeded on down the highway. The Ford, traveling in a westerly direction, met the stage, its left front wheel coming into collision with the left rear fender of the stage. The Ford swerved to its right into the bank and caromed off across the road into the Williams car, causing the injuries complained of.

Appellants present the following grounds for a reversal of the judgments: First, that no negligence is shown on the part of the driver of the stage, which was the proximate cause of the accident; second, that the evidence shows that the driver of the Williams car was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; and, third, that the trial court erred in giving two of the instructions to the jury.

[1, 2] While the evidence on the question of negligence is somewhat conflicting, that most favorable to the respondents shows that their automobile, just prior to the accident, was being driven at a speed of about 35 miles per hour; that the passenger stage, driven by Madsen, passed the automobile to its left on the curve which we have mentioned; that it proceeded down the highway on its left-hand side thereof, and, in entering a left-hand curve, came into collision with the Ford. At the time of this collision it was entirely over on its left-hand side of the road with its left wheels close to the northerly edge of the pavement. The Ford had pulled completely off from the paved portion of the highway onto the dirt shoulder on its right-hand side. The speed of the bus was given as being between 50 and 55 miles per hour. Under these circumstances negligence on the part of the driver of the stage is self-evident, as he was violating several provisions of the California Vehicle Act. Appellants maintain, however, that this negligence was not the efficient cause from which the injury followed in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause. We cannot agree with them. It seems clear from the evidence that the collision between the passenger stage and the Ford threw the Ford into the bank; that it caromed off from the bank into the road and into the automobile of the respondents. The negligence of Madsen in driving the passenger stage at the high rate of speed into the left-hand curve and upon his left-hand side of the highway and into the Ford was the proximate cause of the accident.

[3] Appellants maintain that the driver of the Williams car was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law because he should have stopped before the collision with the Ford. After its impact with the stage, the Ford traveled about 40 feet before striking the Williams car. Between one and two seconds must have elapsed between the collision of the Ford and the stage, and between the collision of the Ford and the Williams car. During this time the Williams car traveled about 80 feet. The driver applied his brakes but did not stop. In this short space of time we cannot say as a matter of law that the driver had ample time and opportunity to stop his car even if he had realized that the collision with the Ford was imminent. We cannot predicate contributory negligence as a matter of law upon this state of facts.

[4, 5] The two instructions complained of by appellants are as follows:

"The State Motor Vehicle Act provides that a vehicle may be driven on the left hand side of the public highway when it is overtaking and passing another vehicle, but in that event it must not be driven on the left hand side of the highway unless the left hand side is clear and unobstructed for at least one hundred yards ahead."

"The State Motor Vehicle Act provides that a driver of a motor vehicle shall not drive the same so as to pass or overtake any other vehicle going in the same direction upon a curve where the driver's view along the highway is obstructed within a distance of one hundred fifty feet."

Appellants urge that the trial court erred in giving these instructions because they are not applicable under the facts of this case.

The first states the rule of law set forth in section 122 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 557). The second is based upon the provisions of subdivision (c) of section 125 of the same act. We have reached the conclusion that under the facts and circumstances of this case both instructions were properly given. The evidence, while not conclusive on the point, would strongly indicate that, at the time the passenger stage started to pass the Williams car, the Ford was not 300 feet distant from it. This being the case, the instruction was properly given. The evidence further indicates that at this point the highway made a curve to the left so that a driver could not see down the road a distance of 150 feet, his view being obstructed by the bank on the northerly side of the road. This evidence was contradicted by appellants, but this merely created a conflict with which we need not be concerned. The trial court was fully justified in giving the second instruction.

Both judgments are affirmed.

We concur: BARNARD, P. J.; JENNINGS, J.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an appeal from an order in a probate proceeding denying the petition of the widow of the decedent to have set aside to her a probate homestead. Fred J. Wyss died on April 19, 1928. His will was admitted to probate on May 11, 1928. In this will, dated July 11, 1925, the testator devised and bequeathed to a named trustee "all of my property both real and personal of whatsoever kind or character and wheresoever situated," to be held in trust upon certain conditions which need not be here fully detailed. In general, it may be said that under the trust provisions the net income of the estate was to be paid to decedent's wife and daughter, $250 per month to the wife, $100 per month to the daughter, and the entire balance of the net income to the wife; the $250 monthly payment to the wife having a priority over any payment to the daughter. The will also provided that, in the event of the death of both the wife and the daughter, without the daughter leaving issue, then one half of the entire estate should go to the legal heirs of the wife and the other half to the legal heirs of the testator. The will then contained a paragraph reading as follows:

"Sixth: The provisions herein made for and the property herein given to my said wife, Dora Wyss, are, and shall be, taken by her in lieu of all her rights, claims and assets given to her by law, in our community property, if any there be, and in my separate estate as my surviving widow."

There was attached to this will, following the attestation clause and the signature of the witnesses, and as a continuation of the same document, the following instrument:

"I, Dora Wyss, the wife of said Fred J. Wyss, the maker of the foregoing will, having read it in its entirety, and clearly understanding that my said husband by his will disposes not only of all of his separate estate, but also all of our community property, in case there is any such, including the share thereof which I am entitled to take and receive by law upon his death, as well as his own share or interest therein, being fully convinced in my own mind of the reasonableness and equity of said will and the wisdom of its provisions, and in consideration of the provisions made for me therein, I hereby elect to and do accept, acquiesce in and consent to said will and all of its provisions, including disposition at the death of my said husband of all of our community property thereunder, and hereby waive all claims to my share of any community property, and any and all other claims, rights, interests and estates which I may have at the time of the demise of my said husband, upon or in all of his separate property and all of our community property, including all of his property exempt from execution and my right to a probate homestead, but not including, however, and expressly excepting therefrom my right to a family allowance out of the estate of my said husband during the probate administration thereon, and I hereby accept such of the said provisions of said will as apply to or concern me, except as above expressly excepted.

"In Witness Whereof, I have hereunto set my hand seal this 11th day of July, 1925, at the City of San Diego, County of San Diego, State of California

"Dora Wyss.

"On this 11th day of July, 1925, at San Diego, State of California, the said Dora Wyss, wife of said Fred J. Wyss, signed and executed the foregoing instrument in our presence, declaring that she did so freely and voluntarily in token of her acceptance of the provisions of and her assent to the will of her husband and her waiver of all her rights, claims and estate in both their community property and the separate property of her said husband.

"Laurence H. Smith Residing at 306 Prospect Street, San Diego, California.

"James G. Pfanstiel Residing at 1333 7th St. San Diego, California."

On May 4, 1929, the widow filed a petition to have set apart to her a probate homestead, which petition contained the following:

"That on or about the 11th day of June, 1925, your petitioner signed a document attached to the Last Will and Testament of said Fred J. Wyss; that petitioner is informed that said document is a waiver of her community interest in the estate of Fred J. Wyss and waives her right to a probate homestead.

"That said petitioner did not intend to waive her claim to a probate homestead at the time she signed said purported waiver, and did not understand that she was waiving her right to a probate homestead at the time she signed said purported waiver; that petitioner does not wish to be bound by said purported waiver, and for that purpose renounces and repudiates said waiver."

The respondent executor filed its answer and objection to this petition, which included the following:

"Admits that on the 11th day of June, 1925, petitioner, Dora Wyss, signed a document attached to the Last Will and Testament of said Fred J. Wyss; admits that said document is a waiver by the said Dora Wyss of her community interest in the estate of Fred J. Wyss, and is likewise a waiver of her right to a probate homestead.

"Denies that the said petitioner, Dora Wyss, did not intend to waive her claim to a probate homestead at the time she signed said purported waiver, and denies that she did not understand that she was waiving her right to a probate homestead at the time she signed said waiver.

"Your objector is informed and believes, and upon that ground alleges, that the said Dora Wyss at the time she signed said waiver of probate homestead fully understood the entire contents of said waiver of homestead, and was completely advised as to the legal effect and purport of said waiver."

Upon the issues thus raised, a hearing was had, and thereafter, on the 16th day of August, 1929, an order was entered denying said petition, from which order Dora Wyss, the widow, is prosecuting this appeal.

Appellant contends that she did not read the said waiver, nor was it read to her; that she did not know she was waiving her right to a probate homestead, and did not know the effect of said waiver; that the effect of said waiver is nothing more than an expression of her willingness to have taken under the will as of the date the waiver was signed; and that, at any time up to the distribution or until she has so conducted herself towards the property of the estate as to be estopped, she may change her election and elect to take under the law.

[1] The first question raised is whether or not appellant understood what she was signing at the time it was signed. The record shows that the evidence upon this point, while conflicting, is ample to sustain the conclusion of the trial court that she knew what she was signing. That particular point may be taken as settled.

[2, 3] The next and most important question presented is the effect of the instrument itself. The entire will and waiver must all be read together. Estate of Whitney, 171 Cal. 750, 154 P. 855, 857. From such a reading, as well as from surrounding circumstances, it is fully apparent that it was the intention of the parties at the time to dispose of and provide what should be done with all of the community property belonging to the parties thereto. In the case just recited, the court said: "The paper signed by Mrs. Whitney was attached to the will, and it evidently was the paper referred to in the preamble of the will as 'the written consent and acceptance of my wife Lucy.' We have no doubt that, as is urged by the appellants themselves, the will and this waiver are to be read together. Such a reading clearly shows what the husband and wife had in mind and what they were undertaking to deal with in the drafting and execution of the two documents."

[4] In the will before us, the testator first gave to a trustee all of his property "of whatsoever kind or character." He was then the "owner and entitled to the possession of all of the community property." Estate of Dargie, 179 Cal. 418, 177 P. 165. In the sixth clause of the will the testator set forth that the provision he had made for his wife, referring to the trust provisions which included his business as well as other property, should be taken by her in lieu of all her rights in their community property, and also in his separate estate. Not only does this refer in express terms to any community property there was, but the waiver signed by the wife clearly refers to the fact that she understands he is disposing in his will, not only of his separate estate, but also of their entire community property; and, in consideration of the provisions made for her she accepts and consents to the will, including its disposal of all of the community property, and she specifically waives any claim to her share of any community property, including her right to a probate homestead. Not only does the language used show that the intention of the parties was to provide for the disposition of all of the community property, but this is also shown by appellant's testimony. She said she had read the will, and she does not yet raise the question that she did not understand that, including the sixth paragraph thereof. It appears from her testimony that she discussed the will with the deceased at the attorney's office in the forenoon of the day it was executed. She testified that at that time she suggested that "at the end of the will it was left rather vague, if my daughter should die without issue, and I did think it should go to my heirs. I didn't think that was quite fair and I suggested that it be put down definitely, it should be divided between the heirs on both sides. Then we went out for lunch." She then testified that after lunch they returned to the lawyer's office, where the instrument was executed, it having been changed in the meantime, in accordance with her suggestion. It is difficult to reconcile this testimony with appellant's present claim that she then thought that the will referred only to the testator's share of the community property. She further testified that she and her husband talked the will over at lunch time, and that, in reply to her question as to why he wanted to give it all to a trust company, he gave as one reason that it would ruin the factory and business to close it down for a year, and that she concurred in that view. This business constituted a large part of the estate at that time, and this evidence is hardly consistent with the idea that the parties then considered the will as referring to the husband's share in the community property.

A further consideration is the certificate attached to this waiver, signed by two of the same witnesses who had witnessed the attached will, in which it is stated that the appellant signed the waiver in their presence, declaring that she did so freely, in token of her acceptance of, and assent to, the will, and of her waiver of all claim to both their community property and the separate property of her husband. We think there can be no question that the effect of this instrument, so far as intended by the parties at the time, was that it should constitute a waiver as to all right of appellant in and to the community property of herself and her husband, including a probate homestead; that by its execution she was consenting to the making of a will by her husband, which disposed of all of their community property as well as his separate property; and that she was accepting the provisions made for her in this will in lieu of what would otherwise have been, under the law, her rights in the property.

[5-8] The only remaining question is as to whether this instrument, entered into with such intentions and under these circumstances, is binding and controlling upon the appellant, or whether she may at any time before distribution change her mind and elect to take under the law, rather than under the provisions of the will. A husband and wife may legally come to an agreement or enter into a transaction concerning their community property. Estate of Sloan, 179 Cal. 393, 177 P. 150; Civ. Code, § 159. No good reason appears why this could not be done in this case, nor why it could not include a waiver or relinquishment of a right to a probate homestead. The will and the waiver must be considered together, and we think they are contractual in their nature. Even one writing may be both a will and a contract. Norton v. Estate of Norton, 41 Cal. App. 614, 183 P. 214. While the instrument attached to this will was a waiver, it was also both a consent and an agreement. In the sixth paragraph of the will the testator states that the provisions made in the will for his wife are and shall be taken by her in lieu of her general legal rights in their community property. In her waiver the wife states, "I hereby elect to and do accept, acquiesce in and consent to said will and all of its provisions * * * and hereby waive all claims to my share of any community property," including her right to a probate homestead. This is not an agreement to do something in the future, but indicates a present agreement. Both the written instruments and the surrounding circumstances indicate a complete and completed plan for the disposition of their community property, in the event of the death of the testator. Whether or not the parties themselves could later have changed this plan, by agreement, or whether some subsequent act by one of the parties might have released the other, is not determinative of whether or not the wife is bound after the death of the husband, the event in contemplation of which the instruments were made, nothing having been done by the parties in the meantime. As was said in the case of Estate of Whitney, supra: "Here, then, we see that the parties executed writings in which they declared plainly that they were making arrangements and stipulations for the purpose of enabling the husband to dispose of the entire community property and of binding the wife to assent to such disposition. The husband was asserting his intention to devise and bequeath the half of the community property which would pass to his wife if she survived him. She was consenting to such disposition and waiving her right to object thereto. * * *"

In that case the will and an instrument attached thereto were very similar to those in the case at bar and the language used in that opinion indicates that the court viewed the two instruments as contractual in nature. In the case before us, even if the attached instrument be considered a waiver, it is one made upon an expressed consideration, and the combined instruments appear to us to have the effect of a contract.

[9] In stating her contentions, appellant urges that she had the right to change her election and elect to take under the law, rather than the will, at any time prior to distribution or until such time as she had conducted herself towards the property in a manner to estop her from so doing. We think she was estopped from denying the validity of the instrument she signed. If this was not true at the time the instrument was signed, it became true when she permitted the situation to remain unaltered until the death of her husband. He was lulled into a sense of security, believing he had made an adequate provision for those dependent upon him.

"Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it." Code Civ. Proc. § 1962.

[10] He was led to change his position in reliance upon her waiver and consent, and the provision he made for his daughter must be very greatly changed if the waiver here involved is set aside. The husband had the right to provide for his daughter to the extent of his share of the community property, which, in this case, was half of the estate; and in giving up this right in reliance upon the promise of appellant, he intended another result, which was approximately equivalent to the right given up, and to now permit the widow to set aside the waiver would alter his position to his prejudice and the prejudice of his heirs. At the time of the husband's death, through this promise and waiver, the appellant received a vested right to all of the income from the entire estate, under some circumstances, and under any circumstances to all of this income except $100 per month. Of course, as a general rule, a widow is not required to make her election in advance as to whether she will take under a will or under the law, but in the case of Dunne v. Dunne, 66 Cal. 157, 4 P. 441, 442, 1152, the court says: "But this rule, like all other general rules, should be applied only when it is reasonable to apply it, and when its application will promote, not defeat, justice."

In the present case, the appellant had already exercised her right of election, and it would neither be reasonable nor just to apply a rule which would be proper in a case where a husband made a will in which, without the consent of his wife, he undertook to dispose of their community estate. We think the appellant has so dealt with the property of this estate that she may not now set aside the election she made upon a definite consideration, and that she may not now make another election, when it is too late for the husband to protect the interests of himself and his heirs. As was said in the case of In re Whitney, supra: "The soundness of this claim involves an inquiry into the true meaning and intent of the writing. It is of no great consequence whether the instrument be viewed from the standpoint of contract, of waiver, or of estoppel. In any aspect its operative effect, as against the right here claimed by the widow, must depend upon an interpretation of its terms."

The effect of the waiver here in question not only depends upon an interpretation of its terms, but we think that, properly interpreted, it must be held to bind the appellant.

In our opinion every equitable consideration is in favor of enforcing the arrangement which these parties made in good faith. Not only was the arrangement an eminently fair one, but the purpose of the combined instrument was one entire plan, which covered all of the community property of the parties. If the purpose and intent of the arrangement is thwarted and changed, it not only leaves a situation contrary to the intention of the testator, but unjust to him and his heirs. If such a situation be brought about by operation of law, not only would the deceased, through his reliance upon the consent and agreement of the appellant, be deprived of an opportunity to make a different and a better provision for his daughter and his other heirs, but his widow would secure the resulting profit by repudiating her own agreement. In our opinion the appellant not only ought to be, but is, bound by the instrument she signed.

[11, 12] Appellant further contends that, even if the waiver is binding upon the appellant, it could not be considered by a probate court, but that, when the jurisdictional facts required by section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure appear, a probate court has nothing to decide, but must set apart a homestead. We are unable to agree with this contention. The right to a probate homestead is not only not a vested one, but is a privilege, the validity of which is to be determined from the conditions that exist at the time the application is made. Estate of Pillsbury, 175 Cal. 454, 166 P. 11, 3 A. L. R. 1396. In passing upon a petition for such a homestead, it was the duty of the court to consider not only the status of the petitioner and the nature of the property, but whether or not the probate homestead had been waived by the petitioner.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SCHROEDER.

Cr. 40.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 14, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 25, 1931.

1. Criminal law 🔑1069(6).

Failure to file application for appeal within five days after giving notice of appeal made dismissal of appeal mandatory (Rules of the Judicial Council, rule II, § 7).

> Rules of the Judicial Council, rule II, § 7, provides that, if an application for appeal in a criminal prosecution is not made within five days after giving notice of the appeal, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designating what portion of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to transcribe, the appeal shall be dismissed.

2. Criminal law 🔑1069(1).

Time for filing of application for appeal could not be extended because application was sent through mail (Rules of the Judicial Council, rule II, § 7; Code Civ. Proc. § 1013).

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; G. K. Scovel, Judge.

Leo M. Schroeder was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal.

Motion granted, and appeal dismissed.

Floyd H. Bowers and Earl F. Crandell, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LAMBERSON, Justice pro tem.

The appellant was convicted of the offense of grand theft in the superior court of Orange county, and judgment was pronounced on November 22, 1930, on which day the appellant gave oral notice of appeal. No written notice of appeal was filed. The notice and application provided for by section 7 of rule II of the Judicial Council, promulgated for the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, was filed on November 29, 1930. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that said application was not filed within the time provided in said section 7, which reads in part as follows: "Upon an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction or from an order denying his motion for a new trial, or from an order made after judgment, or upon an appeal by the people from an order granting a new trial, or from an order setting aside an indictment, information or accusation, or from an order made after judgment, the appellant must, within five days after giving notice of the appeal, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal shall be dismissed; provided, that the appeal shall not be dismissed for any defect in the statement of such grounds or points which does not affect the substantial rights of the respondent."

[1, 2] By the affidavit of appellant's attorney, filed in opposition to the motion to dismiss the appeal, it appears that said attorney's office was in the city of Los Angeles; that immediately following the pronouncement of judgment, and after appellant's attorney had given oral notice of appeal, it was agreed between an assistant district attorney of Orange county and appellant's attorney that the assistant district attorney would attend to the filing of papers necessary to perfect an appeal if the attorney for appellant would mail such papers to such assistant district attorney; that the fifth day after the pronouncement of judgment was Thursday, November 27, which was a legal holiday; that on November 28, appellant's attorney placed the necessary papers in a sealed envelope and sent the same by special delivery in the United States mail, addressed to the district attorney of Orange county; that such papers were deposited in the postoffice prior to 8 o'clock a. m. on November 28; that there is hourly service by mail between Los Angeles and the county seat of Orange county, the actual running time of trains between the two places being 70 minutes; that the documents were delivered at the office of the district attorney of Orange county on the afternoon of November 28, but, through an oversight, were not presented to the trial judge or filed until November 29, 1930. The appellant contends that, by reason of the fact that the fifth day fell on a holiday, the time for filing the application and notice was extended to include all of Friday, November 28, 1930, and that appellant was also entitled to an allowance of one day, under the provisions of section 1013 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the service of papers by mail. The language of section 7 of rule II follows substantially the language theretofore used in section 1247 of the Penal Code, prior to its repeal in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1048), and has been construed in the same manner as said section 1247 was interpreted prior to its repeal. The filing of the application within the time provided by law after giving notice of appeal is mandatory, and, if there has been a failure to conform to the rule, the court is without jurisdiction to consider the appeal. People v. Shaw, 81 Cal. App. 312, 253 P. 747; People v. Riga, 104 Cal. App. 477, 285 P. 1069; People v. Davis, 103 Cal. App. 318, 284 P. 516. The language of section 7 of rule II means that within the time provided by law there must actually be filed with the clerk, and presented to the trial court, the application provided for in said section 7, and the section does not contemplate any allowance of additional time for service of the application by mail as provided in section 1013 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It is ordered that the motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal be granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

FOSTER v. BANKS (two cases).

Civ. 6536.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

March 17, 1931.

1. Malicious prosecution 🔑24(1).

That jury in criminal prosecution were divided on question of guilt was slight, if any, evidence of existence of probable cause as basis for defense in malicious prosecution.

2. Malicious prosecution 🔑24(6).

In action for malicious prosecution, that plaintiffs were held to answer in criminal prosecution was prima facie evidence of probable cause.

3. Malicious prosecution 🔑56.

In action for malicious prosecution, burden of proof is on plaintiff to show want of probable cause.

4. Malicious prosecution 🔑64(2).

Evidence in malicious prosecution action held sufficient, if believed, to overcome prima facie evidence of probable cause established by showing that plaintiffs had been held to answer in criminal prosecution.

5. Malicious prosecution 🔑71(3).

Malice, in action for malicious prosecution, is for jury.

6. Malicious prosecution 🔑71(2).

Whether defendant, in action for malicious prosecution, had probable cause for instituting criminal prosecution, is matter of law for court.

7. Malicious prosecution 🔑71(2).

Where, in action for malicious prosecution, evidence as to ownership of personalty was conflicting, whether evidence warranted inference of probable cause in instituting larceny prosecution held for jury.

8. Malicious prosecution 🔑72(2).

Probable cause instruction, in action for malicious prosecution, held not ground for complaint by defendant.

> The court instructed the jury in part that, if, at time the defendant in the malicious prosecution action caused the arrest of plaintiffs, she did not honestly believe or had a well-founded justifiable suspicion that the plaintiffs had stolen some of her property, then there was no probable cause, but that, on the other hand, if, at time, she had any reasonable grounds for a justifiable suspicion that they had taken any of her property, then there was probable cause.

9. Malicious prosecution 🔑21(2).

If attorneys' advice on which larceny prosecution was instituted was based entirely on false statement of fact by defendant in malicious prosecution as to ownership of goods, such advice would be no defense to action of malicious prosecution.

10. Malicious prosecution 🔑64(2).

Evidence, in action for malicious prosecution, held not to establish that district attorney's advice to defendant was made on independent investigation, as regards question of probable cause in instituting larceny prosecution.

11. Trial 🔑260(1).

Refusing instructions substantially covered by instructions given held not error.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Consolidated actions by H. H. Foster and by Rena E. Foster against Maude Stock Banks. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

R. D. Knickerbocker and Walter D. Tilleson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Walter S. Coen, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

H. H. Foster and Rena E. Foster, husband and wife, the plaintiffs and respondents, each filed separate complaints in the superior court for damages for alleged malicious prosecution against the defendant and appellant, Maude Stock Banks. Afterwards, on stipulation to that effect, an order was made consolidating the cases for the purposes of trial, the jury to return one verdict in both cases, one memorandum of costs to be filed, and it was further stipulated and ordered that "in all further proceedings said actions shall be treated as one case." The actions so consolidated were tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $2,500, of which amount $1,500 was designated as actual and $1,000 as exemplary damages. From the judgment entered upon said verdict, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The plaintiffs were employed by one John M. Seitz at his home near Covina called "The Cloisters," for several years, when the estate was sold to the defendant, the plaintiffs continuing in her employment after such sale. On July 20, 1922, appellant swore to a complaint before the justice of the peace of Covina township, charging respondents with stealing certain household furniture and furnishings of the value of approximately $1,000; thereafter and before the trial thereof in said Covina township appellant swore to another complaint before a justice of the peace of Los Angeles township charging plaintiffs with the crime of grand larceny, on which complaint plaintiffs were held to answer to the superior court. The case pending in the justice's court of Covina township was dismissed on motion of the district attorney two days after filing of the complaint in the justice's court of Los Angeles township. An information was filed in the Superior Court February 16, 1923, to which the plaintiffs here, as defendants, pleaded "not guilty." The cause was partly tried beginning June 6, 1923, ending with the disagreement of the jury, and the case was dismissed on motion of the district attorney on account of insufficiency of the evidence, and respondent's bonds were exonerated.

[1-4] Appellant contends that the warrant was issued only after the district attorney had made an independent investigation and advised her to do so, and after a full and fair disclosure of all the facts to him and to her own attorney, who also advised her she had probable cause, but that he preferred to lay the matter before the district attorney's office before anything was done. The above facts were substantially alleged as a separate defense to the action, as well as the further fact that she filed the complaints in good faith after receiving such advice; and it is argued that appellant's actions after such disclosures and under such circumstances do not make her liable in damages for malicious prosecution. Respondents admit the rule of law contended for by appellant, but urge that, as to the district attorney, the evidence does not show that any independent investigation was made by him, and that, even if it did, as to the ownership of the property, which would seem to be the crucial question in the case, he would necessarily rely on appellant's statement, and, if that was not true, his advice would not be a defense. There is no question but that the goods were found in the possession of the plaintiffs. The evidence is very conflicting as to whether they belonged to the plaintiffs or the defendant. The appellant testified that she bought the property in question from Mr. Seitz, who sold her the real estate. The respondents testified that many of the articles were given them by appellant when she refurnished the house, that others were bought by them in the Middle West and brought to California, while other small articles were given them by Mr. and Mrs. Seitz. There is also evidence in the record which, if believed by the jury would support the conclusion not only that no steps were taken by the plaintiffs to conceal these goods, but that some of them were moved on appellant's trailer and with her knowledge to a residence belonging to the plaintiffs, and then were afterwards moved back to a bungalow on appellant's property, and, as to two rugs involved, one witness testified that appellant said: "Yes, wasn't I a fool for giving her those rugs." It also appears in the record, as we have said, that at the trial the jury in the Superior Court disagreed, and, as we have said, respondents were held to answer to the Superior Court. The fact alone that reasonable men divided on the question of guilt or innocence would of itself seem to be slight, if any, evidence of the existence of probable cause, but there is no question but that the fact that respondents were held to answer is prima facie evidence of probable cause, but it is not conclusive. (Diemer v. Herber, 75 Cal. 287, 17 P. 205), and, while the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution to show want of probable cause, there is ample evidence in the record here, if believed by the jury, to overcome such prima facie showing of the existence thereof.

[5-8] Malice in an action for malicious prosecution is always a question of fact for the jury, but the question of whether or not the defendant in such an action had or had not probable cause for instituting the same is always a matter of law for the court. In this case, as we have said, the question was as to the ownership of the property, and the evidence was conflicting. The jury might have found either way, depending entirely upon their view as to the effect and value of the evidence, and in such a case the jury must pass upon the facts and determine whether or not they warrant or reject an inference of probable cause. Franzen v. Shenk, 192 Cal. 572, 578, 221 P. 932. In that regard the court here instructed the jury as follows: "In order for you to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs you must be convinced that the criminal proceedings instituted by the defendant were instituted without probable cause. The burden of proving affirmatively that the defendant acted without probable cause is on the plaintiff and the question of whether the defendant had or had not probable cause for instituting the arrest and prosecution of the plaintiffs is a matter of law for the court. You are therefore instructed that if you find from the evidence that the defendant caused the arrest and prosecution of the plaintiffs on the charge of stealing personal property from her and at the time did not believe that he or she had stolen anything from her, and that she did not have sufficient knowledge as a cautious and prudent person to believe the plaintiffs guilty of stealing property, then as a matter of law there was no probable cause for the arrest and prosecution of the plaintiffs, and if you find that in causing the arrest of plaintiffs, defendant acted maliciously, your verdict should be for the plaintiffs."

"I think I may state that in a little more simple language, ladies and gentlemen of the jury. As already stated to you, before there can be any verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in this case two things must be proved to exist; first, that the prosecution was without probable cause; and secondly, that it was malicious. Now the court will instruct you upon the question of probable cause, that if at the time the defendant in this action caused the arrest of the plaintiffs she did not honestly believe or have a well-founded justifiable suspicion that the plaintiffs had stolen some of her property, then, of course, there was no probable cause. On the other hand, if at that time she had any reasonable grounds for a justifiable suspicion that they had taken any of her property, then it was probable cause."

The above instruction seems to put the disputed question of ownership up to the jury as fairly as the appellant could ask. Under it, if the jury found from the facts that she was the owner, or even honestly thought she was, their verdict would have been in her favor. On the contrary, if they found the claim of respondents was true, they could hardly infer that appellant believed they had stolen the goods from her.

[9] On the question of advice of counsel, the court instructed the jury as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that the defendant, in good faith, communicated to counsel all the material facts known to her, affecting the question of the guilt of the plaintiffs before a warrant was issued, and then acted upon the advice of counsel, probable cause has been established and you should find for the defendant.

"The advice of counsel is no protection for a party who acts maliciously and knows that the party whom she is prosecuting is not guilty, and further knows that all of the acts which the party against whom she complained of are all consistent with the natural innocence of the accused, and if she proceeds under such circumstances, advice of counsel is no protection, and she would be liable for the damage done." Again, the disputed question of ownership, in which is involved the good faith of the disclosure, is left for the jury to determine, for, if they found that appellant owned the goods, there could be no question of her good faith in communicating to counsel, although she might have acted maliciously, but, if she acted maliciously and knowing respondents owned the property she charged them with stealing, then the advice of counsel was no protection. If she knew that respondents were claiming title to the property, or that she did not own it, and failed to disclose either fact to the district attorney, or her own attorney, there could not have been a full and fair recital of facts, and, unless it was shown that they learned such facts from some other source, she could not rely upon their advice to establish probable cause. Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, 204 P. 578. Or, in other words, if their advice was based entirely on a false statement of fact by appellant as to the ownership of the goods, it would be no defense to the action of malicious prosecution. Franzen v. Shenk, supra.

[10] There is no evidence in the record that the district attorney made an independent investigation upon which his advice was based, even assuming that he did not have to rely upon appellant's statement to him in that regard. Appellant did not testify that he told her he had made an investigation. The entire testimony is as follows: "Q. And did you state the facts to Major McClelland [the deputy district attorney] that you had stated to Mr. Ricketts [her own lawyer]? A. I did.

"Q. And what action did Major McClelland advise you to take? A. As I remember, he said he would like to investigate it, take a couple of days to investigate it.

"Q. Then did you come back to Major McClelland's office again? A. I did.

"Q. And did Major McClelland advise you to sign that complaint charging them with grand larceny? A. He did, after he made his investigation, three days, I think, later." The witness' assumption that an investigation was made is far from legal evidence of such an act.

[11] We see no error in the instructions given by the court, or in refusing to give the two requested instructions by appellant, one of which was for an instructed verdict, and the other covered the defense of advice of counsel which was substantially covered by instructions given.

[12] With regard to the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, it is sufficient to say there is no appeal from such an order (section 963, Code Civ. Proc.), although any error in that regard would be reached by the appeal from the judgment.

Appeal from order dismissed. Judgment affirmed.

TYLER, P. J.

Action for damages. The complaint alleges a cause of action for damages sustained by plaintiff to his automobile as a result of the truck of defendant company colliding with the same, while said truck was being operated by an employee of the defendant company. It is charged that the accident resulted solely by reason of the careless and negligent operation and control of the said truck. Briefly stated, the facts are as follows: Plaintiff's automobile was lawfully parked parallel to the curb on Escobar street in the city of Martinez. At this time a five-ton truck owned by defendant company and operated by an employee was proceeding along said street, approaching the automobile from the rear, and it collided with plaintiff's parked car. The trial court awarded plaintiff judgment in the sum of $500 for damage to his automobile and the further sum of $50 for deprivation of its use.

[1-4] Several grounds are relied upon for a reversal of the judgment. It is first claimed that plaintiff failed to prove any negligence on the part of defendants, which directly and proximately contributed to or caused damage to plaintiff's automobile. In this connection it is argued that the accident was caused by the breaking of an axle of the truck due to a latent defect for which defendants were not liable, as the truck had received proper care and was subjected to regular inspection. The contention is without merit. There is ample evidence in the record to show that the car could have been stopped and the accident avoided had the driver of the truck applied his brakes. Nor does the fact, as claimed, that the breaking of the axle caused such a sudden emergency as excused the driver from applying his brakes in any manner alter or change the situation. The question was one for the trial court to determine from all of the surrounding facts. It is next claimed that the judgment awards plaintiff an excessive amount of damage to his automobile. There is ample evidence in the record that the amount awarded plaintiff was reasonable. The further claim is made that the trial court erred in receiving evidence upon the question of value based upon an offer which plaintiff had received for his car. While it is true that certain witnesses during the course of their examination did testify as to the amount of the offer made to plaintiff, the learned trial judge, as the record shows, at all times insisted that the testimony be confined to the market value of the car at the time of the accident, and that he disregarded and ignored all evidence of the offer. The mere fact, therefore, that there was evidence received of value based upon an offer was not prejudicial and it does not warrant a reversal of the judgment. Equally without merit is the contention that the award in the judgment of $50 for deprivation of use of plaintiff's car is against law. Defendants' negligence deprived plaintiff of the use of his car during the period of its repair. The general rule applicable to the situation is found in section 3333 of the Civil Code, which provides the measure of damage for the breach of an obligation not founded upon a written contract. Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 160, 201 P. 471. It was stipulated by and between the parties that if the court found for loss of use it should be for $5 per day. The appeal is without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

Willis I. Morrison, of Los Angeles, and Ray W. Hays, of Fresno, for appellant.

B. M. Benson and W. H. Stammer, both of Fresno, for respondent.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

This is an action to recover from an insurance carrier the amount of a judgment rendered against the insured in favor of a guest injured while riding in an automobile. Respondent recovered judgment from the insurance carrier by whom this appeal is prosecuted.

Katie Bachman was the owner of the automobile in question and the insured named in the policy of public liability indemnity insurance written by appellant to indemnify her against loss following accidental injury to others. On June 18, 1927, she desired to go from Fresno to San Francisco, and return, in her automobile. She invited Leo Bachman, the respondent; Joseph V. Steele, her nephew-in-law, and his wife, and Forest Bayliss to accompany her upon this trip. As she did not drive the car, Forest Bayliss was taken along to assist Leo Bachman in driving. Leo Bachman was the minor son of Katie Bachman, and Forest Bayliss was her son-in-law. Upon the return trip from San Francisco to Fresno, on June 19, 1927, Bayliss drove the automobile. Mrs. Bachman rode on the front seat by his side. Respondent and Steele occupied the back seat of the car. In going over the Pacheco Pass highway, Bayliss drove the car off the road and it rolled down a steep embankment. The accident resulted in the death of Katie Bachman and the injury of the other three passengers. The question of the liability of appellant for the death of Katie Bachman is considered in the opinion this day filed in case No. 299, entitled Henry Bachman, as Administrator of the Estate of Katie Bachman, Deceased, v. Independence Indemnity Company (Cal. App.) 297 P. 119. The liability of appellant for the injury suffered by Joseph V. Steele is considered in the opinion this day filed in case No. 297, entitled Joseph V. Steele v. Independence Indemnity Company (Cal. App.) 297 P. 120.

On August 2, 1927, respondent commenced an action in the superior court of Fresno county against Forest Bayliss to recover damages suffered by him by reason of his injuries received in the accident. Upon this date Forest Bayliss was served with a copy of the summons and complaint in the office of B. M. Benson, who was the attorney then acting for respondent and who mailed copies of the summons and complaint to appellant at its San Francisco office and at its home office in Philadelphia, Pa. Both copies were received by appellant. For reasons which will hereinafter be set forth, appellant disclaimed responsibility to respondent under the terms of the policy and finally refused to file an answer in the action for or on behalf of Forest Bayliss. After this refusal, an amended complaint against Forest Bayliss was served upon him in November, 1927. No copy of this amended complaint was sent to appellant. He asked for $5,000 general damages and $75 special damages. On January 12, 1928, the default of Bayliss was entered, and, after a hearing and evidence taken, judgment was rendered in favor of respondent and against Forest Bayliss in the sum of $2,575. After the entry of judgment demand was made upon appellant for its payment, which was refused. Respondent then instituted this action against appellant to recover the amount of his judgment under the terms of the policy of indemnity liability insurance. Judgment was entered in his favor in the sum of $2,850.07, this being the amount of the judgment against Forest Bayliss, together with accrued interest.

The answer of appellant presented six separate defenses. A demurrer was sustained to the fifth, and appellant did not amend. In its second defense it denied that the accident and subsequent injuries was caused by any negligence on the part of Bayliss, together with other matters of defense, which are so interwoven with those we must consider that it will not be necessary to detail them here. The fourth alleged a joint enterprise on the part of all of the occupants of the automobile.

[1] The question of the negligence of Bayliss in the operation of the automobile at the time of the accident was determined by the judgment in the case of Leo Bachman v. Forest Bayliss, and, in the absence of fraud or collusion on the part of, or between, the parties to that action, it cannot be litigated here. Bryson v. International Indemnity Co., 88 Cal. App. 100, 262 P. 790; Kruger v. California Highway Indemnity Exchange, 201 Cal. 672, 258 P. 602, 604; 31 Cor. Jur. 461. In the Kruger Case the Supreme Court announced the following rule: " 'The general rule appears to be that judgments are conclusive and binding upon parties and their privies, but as to all others they are neither prima facie nor conclusively binding, for the reason that it would be unjust to bind a person by any proceeding in which he had no opportunity to make a defense, of offering evidence, of cross-examining witnesses, or of appealing if he were dissatisfied with the judgment. Indemnity contracts against loss or liability are sometimes said to constitute an exception to this rule, while again it is said that they do not in fact constitute an exception at all, but are based upon a fair and reasonable interpretation of the contract. It seems to be generally conceded, however, that wherever a surety has contracted with reference to one of the parties in some suit or proceeding in the courts, he is concluded by the judgment.' "

[2] On the question of a joint enterprise the trial court found against the contention of appellant. This finding is amply supported by the evidence, which is conclusive upon this court.

Four interesting questions are presented by appellant's answer which we must consider. They are new in California jurisprudence. Appellant maintains there are four reasons why it was released from its obligations under its policy of indemnity insurance: First, because of the failure of Forest Bayliss to notify appellant of the accident and to transmit to it the summons and pleadings served upon him. Under the terms of the policy, Forest Bayliss, who was the driver of the car at the time of the accident, became the insured as he was operating the car with the permission and at the request of Mrs. Bachman, the named insured. Second, because of the failure of Forest Bayliss to co-operate with appellant in the defense of the action against him. Third, because of alleged collusion between Leo Bachman and Henry Bachman, his guardian ad litem, and Forest Bayliss, which resulted in the judgment against the latter. Fourth, because of a fraudulent agreement between the same parties to fasten an unjust liability upon appellant.

[3, 4] It is admitted that Forest Bayliss failed to give appellant written notice of the accident as required in the policy of insurance. He did not send to it copies of the summons and complaint served upon him on August 2, 1927. These were transmitted to appellant by the attorney for respondent. In the case of Royal Indemnity Co. v. Morris (C. C. A.) 37 F.(2d) 90, 92, this was held to be sufficient notice. The amended complaint was served more than two months after appellant had disclaimed its liability under its policy of insurance and had refused to proceed with Bayliss' defense in the action although requested so to do by him. It is evident from the record that the transmission of this amended complaint to appellant would not have changed its attitude upon its obligation to defend the action or to pay the judgment. It then maintained, and still maintains, that it was released from this obligation. The sending of this amended complaint to appellant would have been a useless act which the law does not require of a party to an action. Appellant cannot predicate its defense upon the failure to transmit to it a copy of this amended complaint as this was excused and as it was not injured by this omission. In fact, counsel for appellant do not stress this question upon appeal.

[5] Appellant lays great stress upon the failure of Forest Bayliss to co-operate with it in a defense of the action against him. The policy of indemnity insurance which furnishes the basis of this action contains the following provisions pertinent hereto:

This policy is the contract between appellant and Forest Bayliss under the terms of which, together with the provisions of law, the rights, duties, and obligations of the parties must be determined. Its terms place no obligation upon Forest Bayliss to co-operate with appellant in the defense of an action. In this respect it differs from the contracts of insurance which furnish the basis for the many decisions from other jurisdictions cited by appellant and relied upon by it to sustain its contention that a failure of the insured to co-operate with the insurer in the defense of an action releases the insurer from liability under its policy. In practically all of the cases cited by appellant the duty of the insured to co-operate with the insurer was made a condition in the policy and of the right of recovery. This condition being omitted from the policy in the instant case, the cases cited furnish no authority for a similar holding here. We conclude that, as the contract placed no duty upon Forest Bayliss to co-operate with appellant in the defense of the suit against him, this failure to co-operate, of itself and standing alone, cannot furnish a defense in the instant action. It must, however, be considered in connection with the defenses of collusion and fraud, as the failure to co-operate, in connection with other facts, might be considered as evidence of either collusion or fraud or both.

[6] The defenses of collusion and of fraud are so interwoven and so closely connected in the evidence and arguments that we will consider them together.

It appears that none of the parties to the action against appellant, nor the children of Katie Bachman, knew of the existence of the insurance policy until after her death. Henry Bachman was appointed the administrator of her estate. When her safe deposit box was opened the policy was discovered. It does not appear just when this happened, but the evidence would justify the conclusion that it was some time between the 1st and the 29th days of July, 1927. After its discovery the policy was taken to B. M. Benson, Esq., who was acting as the attorney for the administrator in the probate proceedings. He thereupon started to investigate the accident and questioned all of the survivors of the wreck. He advised the administrator, Leo Bachman, and Joseph V. Steele that they had causes of action against the insurance carrier, but that they would first have to sue Forest Bayliss, the driver of the car. They thereupon authorized him to proceed with the litigation and he prepared the complaints which were subsequently filed, served on Forest Bayliss, and mailed to appellant on the 2d day of August, 1927. Appellant thereupon sent an adjuster to Fresno to investigate the accident. Ray W. Hays, Esq., had been the local attorney for appellant for a number of years. He was absent from Fresno, but a copy of the summons and complaint was left in his office for his attention upon his return. Frederick W. Docker, Esq., was caring for Mr. Hays' legal business during his absence. The adjuster prepared a written statement of the circumstances of the accident, but Bayliss refused to sign it, giving as his reasons that Mr. Benson had told him to sign nothing. This statement did not contain a detailed account of the circumstances of the accident. It contained assertions, which were in the form of conclusions and opinions, that Bayliss did not consider himself careless or negligent in his operation of the automobile, nor that he considered that any one had a just ground for any claim against him on account of the accident. Except for these legal conclusions and opinions, the circumstances of the accident there set forth did not necessarily differ from those contained in other statements made by Bayliss in which his negligence clearly appears. The evidence concerning the conversation leading up to Bayliss' refusal to sign this first statement is not entirely clear. Mr. Docker testified that he asked Bayliss if the statement correctly set forth the facts of the accident, to which Bayliss replied that it did. The facts contained in the statement do not necessarily refer to nor include statements of legal conclusions or opinions. Further, the trial court found that Bayliss was negligent in the operation of the automobile, which finding is supported by the great weight of the evidence.

Mr. Hays returned to Fresno about the middle of August and interviewed Bayliss at his office. A few days later, after being sworn by a notary public, Bayliss gave a statement of the circumstances of the accident to Mr.

Hays, which was taken down in shorthand. He refused to sign this statement, giving the same reason as before. On August 27, 1927, he was again called to the office of Mr. Hays and there presented with answers to the three complaints filed against him. He read over the answers and refused to sign them, telling Mr. Hays that Mr. Benson had advised him to sign nothing. In an extended conversation with Mr. Hays, Bayliss stated that he was friendly with the plaintiffs in the three actions and thought they should recover for their losses, and that he would like to have them do so if he could do it squarely. He asserted that his negligent operation of the automobile was the sole cause of the accident. Upon his final refusal to verify the answers, Mr. Hays informed Bayliss that appellant disclaimed liability under its insurance policy because of his refusal to verify the answers presented, or any other answers, and his refusal to co-operate in the defense of the actions, and his apparent desire to co-operate with the plaintiffs in their securing judgments against him. Mr. Hays gave him a letter, which was probably a further disclaimer of liability, but which does not appear in the record, and also called Mr. Benson over the telephone, informing him that Bayliss had refused to verify the answers. Under date of August 31, 1927, appellant wrote Bayliss a letter disclaiming responsibility and liability under the insurance policy for the reasons hereinbefore set forth. Shortly thereafter Mr. Benson got into communication with Bayliss and explained to him that he had not told him not to sign any anwers, but merely not to sign any statements prepared by the agents or representatives of appellant, and that it was necessary for Bayliss to sign answers to the complaints filed against him. This conference resulted in Mr. Benson preparing a letter addressed to Mr. Hays which Bayliss signed and mailed. This letter was dated September 8, 1927, and informed Mr. Hays in part as follows:

"I have your letter of August 31, 1927, in regard to the three suits brought against me by Leo Bachman, Joseph V. Steele & Henry Bachman, and note what you say with reference to your denying any liability. You are mistaken in regard to my attitude in this matter. I have not refused to verify any answer which denies negligence on my part, for the simple reason that the accident was caused solely by my negligence and carelessness. I have always been willing and still am willing, and I hereby offer to verify any answer which truthfully sets forth the facts in these cases, and I demand that you prepare such answers for signature and verification.

"No default has been entered in any of these cases and unless you undertake my defense immediately, I shall employ other attorneys and later I expect reimbursement for any sum I am compelled to expend for attorney fees.

"Your attitude throughout the matter has been that you should tell me the facts in these cases instead of accepting the facts from me."

This letter did not change the attitude of appellant. It stood upon its former disclaimer of liability and refusal to represent Bayliss in the litigation. Judgments in the three actions were rendered on January 12, 1928. On that day Mr. Benson informed Mr. Hays that the judgments had been rendered, but that, if Mr. Hays thought appellant had any defenses to the actions, he would set aside the judgments to permit such defenses to be made. Mr. Hays replied that Mr. Benson "had closed the gates behind him" or "had burned his bridges behind him." Under date of June 7, 1928, Mr. Benson wrote Mr. Hays in part as follows: "In view of the apparent misunderstanding of Mr. Bayliss' refusal to verify the answer in the original cases we are considering the advisability of having all of the judgments set aside and the cases dismissed and then filing same over again, and in case this course is pursued, Mr. Bayliss would then verify any answer which you might prepare. Please take this up with the company at once and request an early answer, and when you have received same, please advise me."

As this letter produced no results, demand was made upon appellant to pay the judgments, and, upon its refusal so to do, the three suits were instituted to collect them.

Had the court found that there was fraud and collusion between Bayliss and the plaintiffs which resulted in the judgments against Bayliss, we have concluded that there is ample evidence in the record to have supported such a finding. However, the court found that there was no such collusion or fraud. Appellant seriously questions these findings as contrary to and not supported by the evidence. In addition to the testimony produced by appellant which we have detailed, it introduced evidence showing that Henry Bachman and Steele regarded the bringing of the actions against Bayliss as a joke. They explained that they really did consider it a joke for the reason that Bayliss was without property or assets and earning $17 per week, out of which he was trying to support himself, his wife and child; that his wages were insufficient for this purpose, and that he had to borrow from his relatives in order to pay his living expenses. They also testified that they did not expect to collect judgments from Bayliss. They explained this statement by saying that this belief was founded upon Bayliss' impecunious condition. We believe that the foregoing fairly summarizes the evidence presented by appellant upon which it relies to establish collusion between, and fraud on the part of, Bayliss and the plaintiffs in the actions against him.

In view of the findings of the court against the existence of fraud and collusion, we must determine whether or not there is any evidence in the record, or reasonable inferences to be drawn from such evidence, supporting these findings. This evidence is found principally in the testimony of Mr. Benson. He admits conferring with Bayliss several times and telling him not to sign the statements prepared by the representatives of appellant. He explains this action on his part by saying that it is a well-known fact that adjusters for indemnity companies in obtaining these statements often color them in favor of the company and secure the signature of an unwary witness to a writing that does not exactly present the true facts. He was positive in his testimony that he did not tell Bayliss not to sign any answers to the complaints and did not know that Bayliss had refused to sign or verify the answers until informed of this fact by Mr. Hays over the telephone. He immediately got into communication with Mr. Bayliss and corrected his mistaken idea about the answers and had him sign and mail the letter of September 8, 1927. He further testified that at no time did he advise Bayliss in the litigation or instruct him to do anything in connection therewith except to tell the representatives and attorneys for appellant the truth about all of the circumstances of the accident and not to sign any written statements prepared by them. Of course the impropriety of the attorneys for the plaintiff giving any advice or instructions to the defendant in an action is immediately apparent and needs no further comment. Anderson v. Eaton (Cal. Sup.) 293 P. 788; Elberta Oil Co. v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 291 P. 668.

[7] The answers to the actions filed against Bayliss which were prepared and presented to him for verification are not in the record. It appears from the undisputed evidence, however, that these answers denied negligence on the part of Bayliss, and that when Bayliss refused to sign them he maintained that he was guilty of the accident, or, in other words, that his negligence caused it. While this did not excuse him from signing any answer which might truly set forth a legitimate defense, it did excuse him from signing the answers presented to him. As was said in the case of Royal Indemnity Co. v. Morris, supra: "It may be added that the duty of the insured in respect of permitting a defense in his name is not susceptible to precise general definition. He is not to be a mere puppet in the hands of the insurer; he is under no obligation to permit a sham defense to be set up in his name, nor can he be expected to verify an answer which he does not believe to be true; he cannot evade personal responsibility, and hence is not bound to yield to any demand which would entail violation of any law or ethical principle; but he cannot arbitrarily or unreasonably decline to assist in making any fair and legitimate defense."

As soon as Bayliss was informed of his duty to sign any answers prepared for him which set forth the true facts of the case, he informed appellant of his willingness to verify such pleadings. This information was conveyed to appellant more than four months before Bayliss' default was entered and judgment taken against him. This gave appellant ample time to interpose any legitimate defense that might be urged in the pending actions. While Bayliss was not justified in the position which he first assumed, we think it is equally apparent from the evidence that appellant was extremely prompt in attempting to avail itself of a technical defense and thereby to escape liability for an injury which the record clearly indicates was caused by the negligence of its insured.

[8] We have examined the record and the undisputed evidence shows that Leo Bachman was quite seriously injured in the accident, one of his wrists was broken and the other quite badly sprained. He was severely bruised, and his face and forehead were badly cut. He was confined to a hospital for about two weeks. We are of the opinion that the judgment rendered in his favor was not excessive. He was asleep on the rear seat of the automobile at the time of the accident, and, if there was any legitimate defense to be urged in his suit against Bayliss except as to the amount of his recovery, it does not appear from the record. If there was any such defense to be urged, appellant had ample time in the four months which elapsed between September 8, 1927, and January 12, 1928, in which to prepare an answer setting it forth and to serve and file the same.

Analyzing the evidence, and the arguments of appellant, we find that its grounds for maintaining that the policy was voided because of collusion between Bayliss and the three plaintiffs in the damage actions, and of a fraudulent agreement between them to fasten an unjust liability upon appellant, are as follows: (1) The family relationship between them, which is admitted. (2) The fact that the plaintiffs regarded their actions against Bayliss as jokes, which was explained upon the grounds we have indicated. The trial court accepted this explanation as true. There is a reasonable inference from the evidence supporting this theory. (3) That there was an agreement between the parties not to enforce the judgments against Bayliss. The plaintiffs testified that they did not expect to collect the judgments because his impecunious condition made him judgment and execution proof. Bayliss testified he did not expect to pay the judgments because he could not do so. They all denied that there was any agreement to release Bayliss from paying the judgments. The court's findings against the existence of any such agreement is supported by the evidence. (4) The refusal of Bayliss, at the request of the attorney for the plaintiffs, to sign written statements of the circumstances of the accident prepared by the representatives of appellant. It is admitted by respondent that this was done. This attorney told Bayliss to tell the true facts of the accident, but not to sign statements. Bayliss apparently made several frank and truthful statements of the circumstances of the accident to the attorney for appellant. We know no rule of law, and there is nothing in the policy, requiring him to sign or swear to such statements. The court's finding in favor of respondent on this issue that this action on the part of Bayliss and the attorney was taken in good faith and without any collusive or fraudulent intent is supported by a reasonable inference from the evidence. (5) That Bayliss refused to co-operate with appellant in the defense of the actions against him. The contract of insurance placed no obligation upon him so to do, and this lack of co-operation can only be considered as a circumstance tending to indicate collusion or fraud or both. (6) That Bayliss refused to sign and verify the answers presented to him. These answers presented defenses not in accordance with the circumstances of the accident as claimed by him to be the true facts, and excused him from signing and verifying the answers presented to him. (7) That Bayliss refused to sign or verify any answers in the actions against him under the advice of the counsel for the plaintiffs. According to Bayliss' testimony, and his statements to the attorneys for appellant, they undoubtedly believed this to be true. The attorney for the plaintiffs testified that he had given no such advice to Bayliss and did not know that any answers had been prepared or presented to him, nor that he had refused to sign them until after such refusal when he was told of this fact by one of the attorneys for appellant. He thereupon communicated with Bayliss and informed him that no such advice had been given, and that he would have to sign and verify any answers, the allegations of which conformed to the truth. Bayliss wrote appellant's attorney and informed him that he was ready and willing to sign and verify such answers. Two or more people must collude together. Collusion cannot be on the part of one alone. Nor can a fraudulent agreement to fasten an unjust liability on another be made by one person. The testimony of Mr. Benson and his clients denied collusion on their part. The court found against this contention of appellant, and there is evidence in the record to support this finding. (8) That on account of his relationship to and friendship for the plaintiffs, Bayliss desired them to recover judgments against him. Bayliss admitted this but qualified it with the statement that he wanted them to recover if he could "do it squarely." This desire on his part might have been a natural one prompted by the honest belief that he was negligent and solely responsible for the accident. The evidence points strongly to his negligence. In fact, after reading the record, no other conclusion should be reached. The court accepted and believed this explanation and under the evidence it could do so. (9) From the foregoing facts and combination of circumstances, appellant concludes that there is satisfactory evidence demonstrating collusion between the plaintiffs and their attorney on the one side and Bayliss on the other, and a fraudulent agreement between these persons to fasten an unjust liability on appellant. The court found against this contention and that the parties to the action and the attorney had acted in good faith and without collusion or fraud. This finding is supported by evidence and by reasonable inferences from the evidence.

[9] Appellant and its attorneys undoubtedly believed that collusion and fraud actually existed between Bayliss and the parties suing him at the time of the disclaimer of liability under the policy and the refusal to proceed with the defense of the actions. If such collusion or fraud had existed, they would have been justified in the action they took. Judgments tainted by fraud or collusion should not be permitted to furnish the basis of the actions on the insurance policy. This defense, if established, should prevail, but like any other defense, if not established in the trial court, must fail. The trial court found against appellant on this issue, and the finding finds sufficient support in the evidence to become final in this court.

[10] Appellant confidently urges that, under the decisions in the cases of Metropolitan Casualty Ins. Co. v. Colthurst (C. C. A.) 36 F.(2d) 559; Royal Indemnity Co. v. Morris, supra; Coleman v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co., 247 N. Y. 271, 160 N. E. 367; and Rushing v. Commercial Casualty Ins. Co., 251 N. Y. 302, 167 N. E. 450, the judgment must be reversed.

The two federal cases were decided by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, upon causes of action arising in California. In both the court construed a statute of this state relating to actions against insurance carriers, approved May 21, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 776), which we will hereafter quote at length. United States courts have always conceded to state courts the right to construe and interpret the statutes of their state where federal constitutional or statutory provisions were not involved. We have concluded that the construction placed on this statute by the Circuit Court of Appeals does not conform to that of the courts of California. The cases are also distinguishable in point of fact from the instant case. In the Colthurst Case the policy required the insured to forward to the company the summons and other process as soon as it was served on him. The company had no notice of the service of process in the action in which the judgment was rendered against the insured until three days after its rendition, which fact furnishes the basis of the decision. In the Morris Case the insurance policy contained the provision that the "insured shall in no manner aid or abet the claimant but shall co-operate fully with the company, the Royal Indemnity Company, in defense of such claim or suit," which proviso is wholly lacking from the policy in the case at bar. A violation of this co-operation clause is relied upon by the Circuit Court for the conclusion it reached.

The cases cited from New York are also easily distinguishable from the case we are considering, for two reasons: First, because the duty to co-operate clause appeared in both of the policies; and, second, because of the material difference between the New York and California statutes permitting actions to be filed against the insurance carrier by an injured person.

The California statute (St. 1919, p. 776) is as follows: "Section 1. No policy of insurance against loss or damage resulting from accident to, or injury suffered by another person and for which the person insured is liable other than a policy of insurance under the workmen's compensation, insurance and safety act of 1917 or any subsequent act on the same subject, or, against loss or damage to property caused by horses or other draught animals or any vehicle, and for which loss or damage the person insured is liable, shall be issued or delivered to any person in this state by any domestic or foreign insurance company, authorized to do business in this state, unless there shall be contained within such policy a provision that the insolvency or bankruptcy of the person insured shall not release the insurance carrier from the payment of damages for injury sustained or loss occasioned during the life of such policy and stating that in case judgment shall be secured against the insured in an action brought by the injured person or his heirs or personal representatives, in case death resulted from the accident, then an action may be brought against the company, on the policy and subject to its terms and limitations, by such injured person, his heirs or personal representatives as the case may be, to recover on said judgment. Upon any proceeding supplementary to execution, the judgment debtor may be required to exhibit any policy carried by him insuring against the loss or damage for which judgment shall have been obtained."

The portion which we have italicized does not appear in the New York statute (N. Y. Laws of 1917, c. 524), but otherwise the two are substantially the same. The Supreme Court calls attention to another important difference in the statutory law of the two states in the case of Malmgren v. Southwestern Automobile Ins. Co., 201 Cal. 29, 255 P. 512, 513.

In the jurisdictions which do not recognize the right of an injured person to bring an action on the insurance policy to collect the amount of a judgment rendered against the insured for damages suffered at his hands, the policy is regarded and treated as a private contract of indemnity between the insurer and insured in which no other person may become interested. In the jurisdictions recognizing such a right of action the policy is regarded as a contract between the insurer and the insured for their benefit and for the benefit of an unknown third person who becomes known and identified upon being injured by the insured. The language of our statute authorizing the injured person to file suit against the insurance carrier, after recovery of a judgment against the insured, would indicate that the Legislature intended to adopt the latter rule in California. It would seem a strange and useless proceeding on the part of the Legislature to give to the injured the right to sue the insurer if a recovery in such an action could be defeated by the insurance company and the insured without the knowledge or consent of or any act on the part of the injured person. That the Supreme Court took this view is indicated by the language used in the case of Malmgren v. Southwestern Automobile Ins. Co., supra, as follows:

"It is appellant's contention that no contractual relation is alleged or shown to exist between the injured party and the appellant. The provisions of the statutes, as above quoted, are, as a proposition of law, a part of every policy of indemnity issued by a company or corporation engaged in transacting the kind of indemnity insurance business which appellant was authorized by the law of the state to transact. It was a contractual relation created by statute which inured to the benefit of any and every person who might be negligently injured by the assured as completely as if such injured person had been specifically named in the policy. * * *

"It is contended by appellant that its liability could not accrue under the provisions of the policy until an execution issued upon the judgment obtained against the assured, or judgment debtor, was returned unsatisfied by reason of the insolvency or bankruptcy of said assured. The statute of this state, which is the final word on this issue, does not make the return of the execution unsatisfied a prerequisite to the commencement of an action upon the policy. The statute of the state of New York has such a provision, and appellant had caused to be incorporated in its policy the language of the New York statute verbatim. The substantive law of this state cannot be enlarged, circumvented, defeated, or modified by any provision which the insurer may have elected to place in its contract in derogation of or in conflict therewith. The statute is founded upon principles of public policy, and an anomalous situation would be created if the rights of third parties, for whose protection the law was adopted, could be hindered, delayed, or defeated by the private agreements of two of the parties to a triparty contract. If appellant's contention be sound, then it could, with equal justification, require the question of the assured's bankruptcy to be adjudicated by a competent tribunal before it would be obliged to recognize his insolvency or bankruptcy, or impose other conditions precedent to the injured person's right of action in derogation of express provisions of the law's mandate. We see no merit in the contention. Schoenfeld v. New Jersey Fidelity & Plate Glass Ins. Co., 203 App. Div. 796, 197 N. Y. S. 606, relied upon as an authority in the instant case, is merely declaratory of the New York statute * * * which provides that a cause of action does not accrue to the injured person until an execution issued upon the judgment against the assured has been returned unsatisfied by reason of insolvency or bankruptcy. No such language or language equivalent thereto is found in the statute of this state and neither appellant nor this court is given authority to interpolate the provision of the New York law into a California statute. The clause in the statute which provides that an 'action may be brought against the company, on the policy and subject to its terms and limitations, by such injured person,' was not intended to defeat its purpose upon the theory that an action brought 'on the policy' binds the injured person to a repudiation or waiver of the benefits of the statute expressly adopted for his protection, but it clearly has reference to those matters concerning which the insurer and assured could legally contract."

The following cases support the conclusions which we have reached concerning the construction to be placed on this statute: Marple v. American Automobile Ins. Co., 82 Cal. App. 137, 255 P. 260; Pigg v. International Indemnity Co., 86 Cal. App. 671, 261 P. 486; Bryson v. International Indemnity Co., 88 Cal. App. 100, 262 P. 790, and Langley v. Zurich Gen. Acc. & L. Ins. Co., 97 Cal. App. 434, 275 P. 963.

We are of the opinion that after the happening of an accident coming within the coverage provisions of a policy of insurance, such as we are considering, neither the insurer nor the insured can, by any voluntary act, defeat the statutory right given to the injured person to bring an action on the policy after judgment recovered against the insured without some act or omission on the part of the insured which will relieve the insurer from liability. Of course, collusion or fraud between the insured and the injured to the damage of the insurer, when proven in a proper action, would furnish grounds for the release of the insurer. To adopt any other rule would permit the insurer and insured to revoke or cancel the policy or release the insurer's liability at will after the accident and thus defeat the purpose of the statute, giving the one injured a cause of action against the insurer to enforce his judgment. This was attempted in the case of Finkelberg v. Continental Casualty Co., 126 Wash. 543, 219 P. 12. An examination of this case discloses that the Continental Casualty Company issued its policy of indemnity insurance to Tanaka. On November 2, 1920, and while the policy was in full force and effect, Finkelberg was injured through the operation of an automobile by Tanaka. On July 7, 1921, Finkelberg recovered judgment against Tanaka for his injuries. Upon his failure to collect this judgment he brought suit against the insurer, which defended the action by alleging a release of liability under the policy for a consideration and by agreement with the insured. It appears that on April 11, 1921, before the judgment against Tanaka, and before the service of summons upon him, the insurer paid him $850 for this release. The Supreme Court of Washington refused to recognize this release and held that the right, which finally ripened into a cause of action by Finkelberg against the insurer, accrued at the time of the accident and injury on November 2, 1920. See, also, Metropolitan Casualty Ins. Co. v. Albritton, 214 Ky. 16, 282 S. W. 187.

BACHMAN v. INDEPENDENCE INDEMNITY CO.*

Civ. 299.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 11, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 8, 1931. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 4, 1931.

1. Death 🔑15.

Personal representative or heirs at law cannot recover for death, where deceased would have had no cause of action for injury.

2. Negligence 🔑93(1).

Negligence of automobile driver must be considered as negligence of owner riding with driver and in charge of expedition.

3. Insurance 🔑435.

Recovery cannot be had on automobile liability policy for death of owner of automobile killed by negligence of one driving car at her request.

> The policy insured owner against claims for damages from bodily injuries caused by accident to any person for which she or others named in policy might become liable. The policy showed that owner, had she lived, would have had no right of action against insurer, and therefore her children and heirs at law could have no greater right of recovery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Henry Bachman, as administrator of the estate of Katie Bachman, deceased, against Independence Indemnity Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Willis I. Morrison, of Los Angeles, and Ray W. Hays, of Fresno, for appellant.

B. M. Benson and W. H. Stammer, both of Fresno, for respondent.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

Henry Bachman was at all times herein mentioned the duly qualified and acting administrator of the estate of Katie Bachman, deceased.

On and before June 19, 1927, Katie Bachman was the owner of a Buick sedan. It appears from the allegations of the complaint, and the evidence, that on this date she requested Forest Bayliss to drive the automobile for her, and that while he was driving it over the Pacheco Pass highway, with the deceased sitting beside him on the front seat of the car, he drove it off the highway and over an embankment, killing Katie Bachman and injuring others riding with them.

Prior to the accident, appellant had written and delivered to deceased a policy of public liability indemnity insurance, a copy of which is attached to the complaint and which contains the following:

"The Independence Indemnity Company, (hereinafter called 'the Company') hereby agrees with the Insured named in Statement 1, (Katie Bachman), that if, during the term of this policy, any automobile described in Statement 4, (the Buick Sedan involved in the accident) by reason of its ownership, maintenance or use at any location within the United States of America and Canada, shall cause bodily injuries by accident, whether resulting fatally or otherwise, to any person or persons, and for which bodily injuries the Insured and/or others as hereinafter provided are liable for damages.

"Then the Company Will Insure Against Loss Arising Out of Such Liability, Subject to the Limits Set Forth in Statement 11."

Respondent, as administrator, filed suit against Forest Bayliss on behalf of the children of Katie Bachman for the damage suffered by them from the death of their mother. A default judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $7,507, which judgment became final, but was not paid. Respondent then demanded payment of the judgment from appellant, and, upon its refusal to pay, brought this action. The court below rendered judgment in favor of respondent in the sum of $5,007.

The court found all of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint true, or, in other words, that at the time of the accident Forest Bayliss was driving the Buick sedan at the request, and with the permission of Katie Bachman and for her. While many questions are argued by appellant on this appeal, the only one we need to consider is whether or not the children of Katie Bachman can recover under the language of the public liability policy which we have quoted.

[1] It is well settled in this state that the personal representatives or heirs at law of a deceased cannot recover for a death where the deceased would have had no cause of action for the injury. 8 Cal. Jur. 960; Watts v. Murphy, 9 Cal. App. 564, 99 P. 1104; Good v. City of San Bernardino, 49 Cal. App. 559, 193 P. 790; Burnham v. Stone, 101 Cal. 164, 35 P. 627; Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 369, 190 P. 36. It therefore remains for us to determine whether or not Katie Bachman could have recovered from appellant for her injuries had she survived.

[2, 3] It is admitted by respondent that Bayliss was driving the automobile as the agent and servant of Katie Bachman. He also admits that the negligence of Bayliss in the operation of the automobile caused the accident. Mrs. Bachman was sitting on the front seat by the side of the driver at the time of the accident. She had arranged the trip and had invited the other passengers to accompany her and must be held to have been "in charge of the expedition." Gates v. Pendleton, 184 Cal. 797, 195 P. 664, 666. We must conclude that "the liability of an owner, under the circumstances above described, is doubtless a primary one" (Bosse v. Marye, 80 Cal. App. 109, 250 P. 693, 697), and that the negligence of Bayliss must be considered as the negligence of Mrs. Bachman.

The public liability policy was not a policy of accident insurance indemnifying Katie Bachman against injuries suffered by herself in an accident. By its definite terms it insured her against claims for damages arising from bodily injuries caused by accident to any person or persons, for which she or others named in the policy might become liable. The mere reading of the policy makes it self-evident that Katie Bachman, had she lived, would have had no right of action against appellant for any injuries suffered by her in the accident. She having no cause of action against appellant, it follows that her children and heirs at law can have no greater right of recovery than that given her by the terms of the policy. The complaint failed to state a cause of action against appellant, and the judgment is not supported by either the pleadings or the findings.

Appellant urges many other grounds for a reversal of the judgment, but it is not necessary that we consider them here. The case of Leo Bachman v. Independence Indemnity Co. (Cal. App.) 297 P. 110, the opinion in which is this day filed, considers some of them and may be referred to for a further statement of the facts and questions involved.

Action by Joseph V. Steele against the Independence Indemnity Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

This is an action to recover from an insurance carrier the amount of a judgment rendered against the insured in favor of a guest injured while riding in an automobile. Respondent recovered judgment from the insurance carrier who prosecutes this appeal.

This is a companion action to the cases of Leo Bachman, a minor, by Henry Bachman, his guardian ad litem, v. Independence Indemnity Company, a corporation (Civil No. 298) 297 P. 110, and Henry Bachman, as administrator of the estate of Katie Bachman, deceased, v. Independence Indemnity Company, a corporation (Civil No. 299) 297 P. 119, the opinions in which are this day filed. The facts and issues here are similar to those detailed in the Leo Bachman Case, except as to the injuries suffered by respondent and the amount of damages recovered by him.

The evidence shows that respondent was sitting by the side of Leo Bachman on the rear seat of the automobile driven by Forest Bayliss. Steele suffered a broken collar bone, bruises on his head, back, and legs, and was unable to work for about three weeks. He was dozing at the time of the accident and was not able to testify to any of the circumstances leading up to it. In his action against Forest Bayliss judgment was rendered in his favor in the sum of $750. In our opinion this judgment was not excessive. Judgment was rendered in his favor in the instant case in the sum of $835.61, this being the amount of his judgment against Forest Bayliss, plus accrued interest.

For the reasons given and upon the authorities cited in the opinion this day filed in the case of Leo Bachman, a minor, by Henry Bachman, his guardian ad litem, v. Independence Indemnity Company, a corporation, Civil No. 298, supra, the judgment herein is affirmed.

WILSHIRE-COMMONWEALTH CORPORATION et al. v. STATE CORPORATION DEPARTMENT et al.

Civ. 7818.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

March 21, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 21, 1931.

1. Courts 🔑207(2).

Where application for certiorari may lawfully be made to lower court in first instance, higher court will not assume jurisdiction, unless circumstances set forth in petition render it proper that writ should originally issue from appellate court to which application is made (Rules of Supreme Court and District Court of Appeal, rule 26).

2. Courts 🔑207(2).

Certiorari to review order suspending permit to sell securities was denied, where application for writ should have been made to Superior Court in first instance, and writ raised questions not directly affecting public welfare (Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, Rule 26).

Application for certiorari by the Wilshire-Commonwealth Corporation against the State Corporation Department and another to review an order of the Department suspending a permit to sell and issue convertible notes and shares of stock.

Writ denied.

CONREY, P. J.

On petition for rehearing, after the entry of an order denying petition for writ of certiorari.

[1] One of the reasons for denying the petition for the writ was that the application should have been made to the Superior Court rather than to this court. While the jurisdiction is concurrent, the rule of practice is that, where the application might have been lawfully made to a lower court in the first instance, the higher court will not assume jurisdiction of the cause, unless the circumstances set forth in the petition are such as to "render it proper that the writ should issue originally from the appellate court to which such application is made and not from such lower court." Rule 26 of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal.

In denying the application for the writ, the justices of this court were of the opinion that petitioner will not be exposed to the dire consequences described by it as results likely to ensue from the determination of this court that the petition should have been filed in the Superior Court.

[2] Notwithstanding the alleged magnitude of the interests involved, the questions raised concerning the order sought to be reviewed are not such that they directly affect the public welfare. Furthermore, the order made by the commissioner of corporations (suspending the permit theretofore granted to petitioner to sell and issue its convertible notes, and shares of stock) is an order suspending the permit only "in so far as the same authorized or permitted the sale and issuance of securities of said applicant." Conceding for the moment that the commissioner would be without jurisdiction to make any order which would prevent the exercise of rights vested in respect to convertible notes which were sold before the date of the order of suspension, it does not appear that by said order of suspension the commissioner has attempted to accomplish any such interference with rights thus vested.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment for compensation of loss by fire, which judgment was rendered pursuant to the terms of an insurance policy. It is claimed liability under this policy was waived by the insured by failure on his part to supply the company with sworn proof of loss as required by the contract.

The plaintiff Western owned a store building, together with fixtures and a stock of merchandise at Ceres. The merchandise was subject to a chattel mortgage to secure the loan of $2,000 which was held by the plaintiff Francis. Except for this mortgage, Francis had no interest in the property. Russell & Robbins are insurance brokers who maintain their office at Modesto. They were agents in Stanislaus county for the defendant, Iowa National Fire Insurance Company of Des Moines. The defendant admits this agency, but denies they had authority to adjust claims of loss in behalf of the company, or to waive the furnishing of proof of loss by the insured as required by the terms of the policy.

December 29, 1926, the agent Russell visited the store of plaintiff Western and took his application for $1,500 insurance on the fixtures and stock of merchandise. The agent then had full knowledge of the existence of the chattel mortgage. The following morning the policy was duly issued insuring the stock and fixtures of plaintiff Western for $1,500 in the Iowa National Fire Insurance Company. At noon on December 30th, the agent Russell delivered the policy to Western and collected the balance of the premium amounting to $32.63. In the meantime, following the acceptance of the insurance, a fire occurred during the night which entirely destroyed the building, fixtures, and stock of merchandise. Notice of the loss by fire was promptly given to the agents Russell & Robbins. Russell sent a telegram to R. H. Jenkins, general agent of the defendant insurance company, at his office in Los Angeles. The message read:

"Modesto, Calif., Dec. 30, 26

"R. H. Jenkins, A. G. Bartlett Bldg., Los Angeles, Calif.

"Wrote Pol. No. 616522 yesterday and store burned at four A. M. today. Two parties not interested in [it] in jail for setting fire. Suggest you sending adjuster Wm. Brown, Stockton, Clark Hotel for adjustment. Would appreciate quick settlement.

"[Signed] R."

To this wire, Jenkins replied: "Adjuster Fargo of this city leaving for Modesto tonight." On the morning of December 30th, Russell & Robbins forwarded to Jenkins a complete report of the issuing of the insurance policy to Western. A few days later they sent Jenkins their check for $32.63 in payment of the premium on the policy. On January 4th this check was returned to Russell & Robbins with a letter containing the following paragraph: "This morning in checking over the slips that came in with the numerous checks from various agencies, she [the clerk] finds a memorandum that this check paid for policy No. 616522 in which P. G. Western is named as the assured. As we are not at the present time in a position to either admit or deny liability under this particular policy, we cannot at this time accept payment of the premium and you are instructed to return same forthwith to the assured."

Mr. Russell informed the insured that his check in payment of the premium had been returned by the general agent. The check, however, was not delivered to the insured. To the question which was propounded to Mr. Western, "Did you ever know that Mr. Russell had received a return check from Mr. Jenkins' office?" he replied, "Yes, he told me that he had received it." Russell constantly encouraged the claimant to believe that the insurance company would adjust and pay the loss which resulted from the fire. Mr. Russell promptly wrote to the general agent, Jenkins, saying he did not intend to return the premium to the insured; that the contract of insurance was legitimate and binding; and, "if we have to expect the Iowa National to renege on us on this loss, we wish to know at once, so we will know how to proceed with this agency in the future, but in this loss, we must stand back of Mr. Western and Mr. Francis as they are innocent parties in this loss. * * * We will not return the check to Mr. Western as this claim must be settled." To this letter the general agent replied as follows:

"February 7, 1927.

"Messrs. Russell & Robbins, 1103 I Street, Modesto, California.

"Gentlemen: Re policy # 616522—Western. As the above numbered policy was issued after the loss and there was no agreement between you and Mr. Western as to which company this policy should be issued in, we are, at the present time having the matter further investigated.

"Also as I have informed you before, you have violated the companies' instructions in issuing a policy on a stock encumbered by a chattel mortgage, and we feel certain that if the company should have been called upon to pay this claim they would have looked to you for reimbursement."

The adjuster, Fargo, visited the premises on December 31, 1926. He interviewed the plaintiff Western, who then furnished him with a complete list of the property which was destroyed by the fire, together with his valuation of the various items thereof. After this written statement had been completed, the adjuster left. Mr. Western testified that the adjuster then said "that was all that he wanted with me, and that I would hear from him in a few days." The insured heard nothing further directly from Fargo, the adjuster, or from the general agent of the defendant company. No sworn proof of loss was furnished to the company by the insured. Western claims to have been induced to believe, from the conduct and declarations of the agents of the insurance company that the filing of this sworn proof of loss was waived. He testified, in addition to the foregoing conduct and statement of the adjuster, that Russell frequently said "he would take care of it [the collection of the insurance] for me, whatever was necessary, and I left it up to him to take care of." He further testified that he visited the office of Russell & Robbins thirty days after the fire, and stated that "I asked them if there was anything else to file, or to sign, and he [Russell] said there was not, that he had taken care of everything. * * * Q. At that time Mr. Russell said he had taken care of everything necessary? A. Yes sir. Q. To collect the money from the insurance company? A. Yes sir." These statements were also corroborated by Mr. Francis. At the trial, Mr. Russell frankly admitted the foregoing facts, and said, with respect to his failure to file the proof of loss, or to notify the insured that the company denied its liability under the policy: "I told them [the insured] at different times, especially Mr. Francis, * * * I didn't think it was necessary for us to make a sworn affidavit and file a proof of loss at that time. * * * Q. Now, you knew that a second notice, or a notice of proof of loss was due then in 60 days, did you not, after the fire? A. Well, not under these circumstances, no sir."

No part of the insurance was paid by the company. In April, 1927, this suit upon the policy was commenced. The defendant answered the complaint controverting all the material allegations thereof. The answer denies that the insurance policy was ever issued or authorized by the company, or that it was obligated to pay any sum of money thereunder. As separate defenses, the answer also alleges the policy is void because it was issued in violation of the provision therein contained that "this company shall not be liable for loss or damage to any property insured hereunder while encumbered by a chattel mortgage." It further asserts that all claim for compensation for loss by fire is forfeited by the insured because of his failure to file a sworn proof of loss within 60 days after the fire occurred, as required by the terms of the contract.

Findings favorable to the plaintiffs were adopted by the court upon all material issues. A judgment for $1,500 and accrued interest, aggregating the sum of $1,635.63, was accordingly rendered in favor of the plaintiffs. From this judgment an appeal was perfected.

For reversal, the appellant relies solely on its contention that the insured forfeited all claims for reimbursement under the insurance policy by failure to furnish the company with sworn proof of loss within 60 days of the time when the fire occurred. It is asserted the conduct of Jenkins, the adjuster, acting in behalf of the company, did not amount to a waiver of the clause of the policy requiring the proof of loss to be furnished. It is further claimed the insurance brokers, Russell & Robbins, were merely local or special agents without authority to waive the filing of this proof of loss.

[1, 2] There is ample evidence in the record to support the finding that the insurance policy was duly executed by authority of the defendant, and that the clause in the policy which exempts the company from liability when the insured property is found to be incumbered by mortgage, was waived, since the agent had full prior knowledge of the chattel mortgage and full power to accept risks and issue policies for fire insurance. It is unnecessary to cite authorities or further elaborate on these issues, since the appellant is urging neither of them as a ground of reversal.

The provision of the policy requiring sworn proof of loss to be furnished within 60 days after the fire occurred was waived by the insurer for three reasons: (1) The course of conduct and declarations of the agents of the defendant led the insured to believe this requirement was waived; (2) the company denied all liability under the policy before the expiration of the 60-day period for filing proof of loss; (3) the company promptly sent its adjuster to interview the insured and procured from him complete information concerning all property which was destroyed by fire together, with detailed valuation thereof.

[3] The obvious purpose of adopting the clause of a fire insurance policy requiring the furnishing of sworn proof of loss within a limited time after the fire occurs is to protect the insurer against fraudulent claims. There is no statutory provision requiring such notice to be furnished. In the absence of fraud on the part of an insured, a court should carefully examine the evidence regarding the failure to furnish proof of loss by fire so as to avoid a forfeiture of legitimate claims merely because of technical omissions. Ramirez v. United Firemen's Ins. Co. of Phila., 46 Cal. App. 451, 455, 189 P. 309.

[4] The insured is charged with no fraud in the present case. The company was informed of the fire the very day it occurred. An adjuster was promptly sent to investigate the origin and result of the fire. He interviewed the insured and secured from him a detailed statement of the property which was burned and its valuation. The adjuster left, saying to the insured, "that is all I want of you; you will hear from me in a few days." Having given to the adjuster a detailed statement of his claim of loss, it is not unreasonable to assume the insured believed no further proof of loss would be required. Neither the adjuster nor the company directly communicated with the insured after taking this data. No complaint was made regarding the property which the insured claimed to have lost, nor its reported valuation. Moreover the defendant's local agents, Russell & Robbins, who had the apparent authority to represent the company as general agents, with the exception of adjusting losses, specifically assured the plaintiff Western they would do everything necessary to collect his insurance. Russell told him there was nothing further required of him to do or sign. Clearly this deceived the insured into believing the furnishing of the sworn proof of loss was waived. Silence on the part of the defendant regarding its intentions undoubtedly helped to deceive the insured. Under the circumstances of this case, having determined to repudiate its obligations under the policy on all grounds, the defendant should have notified the insured so that he could protect himself by conforming literally to the terms of the contract regarding this proof of loss. This omission may reasonably be attributed to the negligence and fault of the defendant and its agents. Section 2636 of the Civil Code provides that: "Delay in the presentation to an insurer of notice or proof of loss is waived, if caused by any act of his, or if he omits to make objection promptly and specifically upon that ground."

The appellant, however, contends the conduct and declarations of the adjuster were insufficient to constitute a waiver of this provision of the policy, and that the insured admitted he did not rely on the adjuster's acts or declarations. Very likely the insured did rely chiefly on the assurance of the agent Russell that he would look after the collection of the claim, but certainly his belief that no further proof of loss or notice was required was greatly strengthened by the conduct of the adjuster.

[5] The appellant seeks to escape from the responsibility of the declarations made by Russell on the ground that he was a mere special agent with no power to adjust claims and consequently with no authority to waive the provisions of the policy respecting the proof of loss. There is no evidence that the insured knew the agent Russell had no authority to waive this provision of the policy. Apparently Russell had all the authority of a general agent to bind the company which he represented, except the power to adjust claims. A general agent of a fire insurance company, who has power to contract for and bind the company in the conduct of its business, has the authority to waive the clause of a policy requiring sworn proof of loss. The authorities are fairly uniform to the effect that an agent who has the power to adjust losses sustained by fire may also waive the furnishing of written proof of loss. 26 C. J. 393, § 507; 33 C. J. 23, § 680; 7 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 5955, § 12a. A number of reputable authorities are cited by the appellant from other jurisdictions which hold that an agent who has no authority to adjust losses has no power to waive the terms of the contract. Hottner v. Fire Ins. Co., 31 Pa. Super. Ct. 461; Bush v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co., 63 N. Y. 531; Ermentrout v. Girard Fire & Marine Ins. Co. of Phila., 63 Minn. 305, 65 N. W. 635, 30 L. R. A. 346, 56 Am. St. Rep. 481. By the great weight of authority, however, the right to adjust claims is not necessarily the test as to the power to waive the furnishing of proof of loss. 7 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 5966, § 12e; 26 C. J. 393, § 507. And it is said in the authority last cited: "If an agent has apparent authority to waive notice or proofs, the insurer is bound by his act in doing so, regardless of his actual authority."

[6] In the present case it appears the agents Russell & Robbins had all the powers of a general agent to bind the company except the authority to adjust claims. We are satisfied the combined acts and declarations of the defendant and its agents Jenkins and Russell had the effect of waiving the furnishing of sworn proof of loss.

[7] The insurance company waived the provision of the policy requiring sworn proof of loss to be furnished by denying its liability. In Lee v. U. S. Fire Ins. Co., 55 Cal. App. 391, 396, 203 P. 774, 776, it is said: "The denial of such liability prior to the expiration of the time to make proof of loss is a waiver of the condition of the policy requiring such proof. Farnum v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 83 Cal. 263, 17 Am. St. Rep. 233, 23 P. 869; Royal Ins. Co. v. Martin, 192 U. S. 149, 48 L. Ed. 385, 24 S. Ct. 247. [See, also, Rose's U. S. Notes.]"

To the same effect are the following authorities: 7 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 6019, § 14a; 26 C. J. 406, § 522; 33 C. J. 32, § 694; 5 Joyce on Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 5592, § 3373. In the last cited authority at page 5564, section 3354, it is said: "The question concerning whether or not there has been a waiver of this provision must in all cases depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. The courts will construe this provision, as a rule, against the insurer, and will not scan very closely evidence introduced by the insured tending to rebut a technical forfeiture."

[8] From the evidence in the present case, it must be assumed the company at all times intended to repudiate its liability under the policy. This is the effect of its correspondence with the local agents. This purpose must be inferred from its general conduct. The defendant promptly returned to its agents the plaintiff's check for the payment of his premium on the policy saying: "You are instructed to return same forthwith to the insured." It is true that the defendant also said in this letter: "We are not at the present time in a position to either admit or deny liability under this particular policy." Good faith on the part of the company in making this statement was a matter for the court to determine. We do not impute bad faith on the part of the defendant. But if the company had determined to repudiate the obligations of the policy, and anticipated the insured might neglect to file his proof of loss, in view of the foregoing well-established principle of law, a possible defense to an action on the policy might be saved by failure on the part of the insurer to definitely deny its liability. The defendant's subsequent conduct indicates that it had definitely determined to deny its liability. On February 7th, the company wrote its local agents saying that, prior to the fire, "there was no agreement between you and Mr. Western as to which company this policy should be issued in." The defendant further said, "You have violated the companies' instructions in issuing a policy on a stock encumbered by a chattel mortgage, and we feel certain that if the company should have been called upon to pay this claim, they would have looked to you for reimbursement." This letter certainly infers that the company did not assume it would be called upon to pay the claim. The company so notified its agents. The reasonable inference from these communications is that the company intended to repudiate its liability. But the appellant argues that the contents of this letter were not communicated to the insured, and that it therefore furnishes no grounds upon which to base a waiver. We do not understand the authorities require the knowledge of the general denial of liability on the part of the insurer to be communicated to the insured in order to create a waiver of the requirement to file proof of loss. Indeed some reputable authorities hold that a general denial of liability made by the insurer for the first time in its answer, constitutes a waiver of this clause. 7 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 6039, § 14e. It is, however, unnecessary to accept this extreme view in the present case. Knowledge of the return of the premium check was conveyed to the insured. Moreover the defendant's local agents knew that the insured relied upon them to do everything that was legally necessary to collect the insurance. Russell told the plaintiffs he did not think it was necessary to file proof of loss under the circumstances. Even Jenkins, the general agent, told Western after he had listed the various items lost in the fire and their valuation that that was all he wanted of him. It was the duty of the agent Russell to have told the insured that the defendant was evidently repudiating its obligations under the policy, so that the plaintiffs might be warned to protect themselves by filing the proof. The insured was deceived by the entire course of conduct on the part of the defendant and its agents. In the answer, and throughout the trial of the case, the defendant did deny its liability on the ground that the contract was void. We are satisfied the conduct and declarations of the defendant amount to a denial of its liability and that this constitutes a waiver on that ground of the provision requiring the furnishing of proof of loss.

[9] Sending an adjuster to the insured immediately after the fire, who obtained a full report of the property which was destroyed and its value, and who then told the insured that was all they wanted of him, and he would hear from them in a few days, constitutes conduct which would tend to deceive the insured regarding the requirement to supply further proof of loss, and furnishes evidence of a waiver of this clause of the contract. Ramirez v. United Firemen's Ins. Co., 46 Cal. App. 451, 454, 189 P. 309; 26 C. J. 403, § 517; 33 C. J. 30, § 690; 7 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 6010, § 13g; 5 Joyce on Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 5564, § 3354 and p. 5606, § 3385. In the authority last cited it is said: "The general rule seems to be, * * * that any act or series of acts upon the part of the insurer which tend to create a belief in the mind of the claimant under the policy that notice need not be given, or that proofs of loss will be unnecessary, will operate as a waiver, and release such claimant from a compliance with the provision."

On page 5607 of the last-cited authority, the author says: "If the insurer by its acts and conduct leads the claimant to believe that the company is preparing to adjust the loss, the insurer will be estopped from claiming the proofs were not furnished as provided in the policy."

Under the facts and circumstances of this case, we are unable to say there is no substantial evidence to support the findings of the court to the effect that the furnishing of sworn proof of loss was waived by the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEVINSON v. SANTA CLARA VALLEY LAND CO. et al.

Civ. 6654.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

March 26, 1931.

1. Account stated 🔑19(3).

Evidence sustained finding of account stated, justifying recovery of real estate salesman's commissions by salesman's assignee.

> It appeared that parties entered into contract whereby all commissions due from third person to real estate salesman's employer or debtor were assigned to salesman as security for commissions due him, and third person was authorized to pay to salesman specified amount, after which any surplus should be payable to salesman's debtor. It appeared further that third person was not indebted to salesman, but was indebted, if at all, only to salesman's debtor.

2. Pleading 🔑243.

Real estate salesman's assignee suing for commissions held properly allowed to amend complaint and introduce evidence to show that salesman was duly licensed real estate agent.

> It was contended that complaint in question was not susceptible of amendment, since it was in effect no pleading whatever, for the reason that it lacked an essential allegation, and that bringing of action should date only from filing of complaint as amended.

3. Pleading ⚷236(1).

Amendments of pleadings are to be allowed in sound discretion of court and in furtherance of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by William Levinson against the Santa Clara Valley Land Company, A. B. Widney, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant last named appeals.

Affirmed.

H. E. Gleason and Louis Feinstein, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

[1] The appeal in this case by the defendant A. B. Widney from a judgment against him in the sum of $4,356.90, including costs, involves the second cause of action in a complaint, which count is founded upon an account stated. It appears that for some time prior to December 19, 1923, the plaintiff's assignor, A. L. Martin, had been employed as a real estate salesman by appellant, who was then doing business as the Suburban Estates Company; that his compensation was 2½ per cent. commission on all sales made, plus an additional commission on sales made by him personally; that at the time mentioned appellant was indebted to Martin somewhere in the neighborhood of $15,000 for commission earned. On this date the parties, together with one J. B. Meikle, entered into an agreement whereby the business was to be conducted as theretofore, under the name of the "Suburban Estates Company"; that each of the three parties were to receive "a weekly salary or compensation" as follows: "A. B. Widney, $250.00 A. L. Martin, $150.00 (out of his 2½% overhead commission) J. B. Meikle, $100.00, payable from said proceeds Saturday of each week. Neither of said parties is obligated personally for any of said payments." Between the date of the agreement from which we have just quoted and April 19, 1924, Martin "earned approximately $5,000," and drew $4,722.71. On the last-mentioned date the parties entered into the following agreement: "Final Settlement Agreement. In consideration of the transfer of two hundred (200) shares of stock in the Santa Clara Valley Land Company and the release of the contract of employment between said Santa Clara Valley Land Company and other claims of every nature against the Santa Clara Valley Land Company and the Suburban Estates Company and A. B. Widney the undersigned do hereby assign to A. L. Martin, all of the commissions due and to become due from Maurita Grove Company to the undersigned under the selling agency contract entered into on the fifteenth day of September, 1923, between said Maurita Grove Company and Suburban Estates Company, as security for the payment of the commissions and compensations now due or to become due, to said A. L. Martin under his contract with the Suburban Estates Company and with the Santa Clara Valley Land Company and A. B. Widney, as salesman and sales manager for the sale of properties in the Pacoima District and elsewhere, and authorize said Maurita Grove Company to pay same to said A. L. Martin up to the amount due, or to become due to him, in the amount of fifteen thousand, one hundred, thirty seven dollars and sixty-one cents ($15,137.61). Any and all surplus remaining unpaid after the payment of said commissions due to said A. L. Martin are to be accounted for and paid to Suburban Estates Company or its assigns." (Italics ours.) The signatures of all the parties appear. Payments were made regularly by the Maurita Grove Company for the difference between the $15,137.61 and the unpaid balance which the court found was $4,306.

The principal contention of appellant is that, inasmuch as none of the parties were obligated to pay the weekly compensation mentioned in the agreement of December 19, 1923, the memorandum of April 19, 1924, cannot be taken to mean an acknowledgment of or a settlement of their accounts as of its date. It is also said that under the "facts and circumstances of the case" the agreement should be read to mean that it creates no new liability. It must be borne in mind that the trial court had all the facts and circumstances before it and was from that standpoint better able to determine the intent of the parties than are we. But, even to us, when we take into consideration testimony to the effect that the Santa Clara Valley Land Company was not indebted to plaintiffs' assignor, but only, if at all, to the Suburban Estates Company, it seems inescapable that the parties had agreed upon the sum of $15,137.61 as being due to Martin as his commissions in acting as salesman. Whether it is determinative of the question or not, there is the fact that the agreement of December 19, 1923, only provided that Martin was to receive a drawing account of $150 per week chargeable against his commission of 2½ per cent. It is also to be observed that he had earned approximately the amount mentioned in the "Final Settlement Agreement" before the so-called co-operative agreement. There is nothing made to appear in appellant's brief which would justify us in saying that the finding of the court to the effect that an account was stated between A. L. Martin and the defendant is not supported by the evidence.

[2, 3] Appellant also asserts that the court erred in permitting plaintiff to amend his complaint by alleging that his assignor was a duly licensed real estate agent and permitting him to make proof of that fact. The statement of the argument or position of the appellant in this particular carries its own refutation. He says: "The amended complaint on which plaintiff went to trial was not susceptible of amendment, being in effect no pleading whatever, and the bringing of the action should date from date of filing of the second amended complaint." This simply means that, when a complaint lacks an essential allegation, it is no complaint and cannot be amended, but such is not and never was the law. Amendments are to be allowed in the sound discretion of the court and in the furtherance of justice. The rule of law is too well known to necessitate the citation of authority. No other arguments are advanced.

Judgment affirmed.

112 Cal. App. 636

BENCE v. TEDDY'S TAXI et al.

Civ. 4198.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 17, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 16, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 14, 1931.

1. Automobiles 🔑227(3).

Facts justified recovery for pedestrian struck by taxicab under last clear chance doctrine.

Facts showed that plaintiff alighted from street car at a corner when the car stopped at the safety station at that point. He started to walk at once toward the sidewalk; the curb being some 18 feet distant. Without looking in the direction from which the defendant's taxicab was approaching, he walked some 8 feet, when he saw it bearing down on him. He attempted to jump to the sidewalk, but was struck before he reached it. All of these movements were seen and known to the driver of the taxicab, who was driving at a speed found to be in excess of 25 miles an hour.

2. Negligence 🔑83.

"Last clear chance" rule necessitates plaintiff's negligence, putting him in danger from which he cannot escape by ordinary care, of which danger defendant is aware under such circumstances that he realizes, or ought to realize, plaintiff's inability to escape therefrom, and defendant has clear chance to avoid injuring plaintiff by ordinary care and fails to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Last Clear Chance," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Automobiles 🔑164(1).

Where pedestrian, alighting from street car, immediately started to walk toward sidewalk, on-coming taxicab driver owed duty to stop, under facts.

Facts showed that the taxicab driver saw the pedestrian's situation. He was aware of the pedestrian's dangerous position, and realized, or ought to have realized, pedestrian's inability to escape therefrom. The instant that pedestrian started to walk from the safety station to the sidewalk, he was in a position of danger.

4. Evidence 🔑539.

Taxicab operator could testify as expert as to distance in which he could stop taxicab while driving at given speed.

The witness was one of the partners who owned and operated the taxicab involved in the collision. He had driven taxicabs of the same type, and had driven automobiles for some fourteen years.

5. Pleading 🔑121(3).

Whether taxicab driver striking pedestrian was in defendant's employ at time of collision was presumptively within defendant's knowledge, precluding denial of such fact on information and belief.

6. Pleading 🔑121(3).

Denial of facts presumptively within defendant's knowledge, on information and belief, will be treated as evasion.

7. Appeal and error 🔑169.

Objection raised for first time on appeal could not prevail.

8. Damages 🔑132(1).

$6,800 held not excessive for injuries to pedestrian struck by taxicab.

Pedestrian testified that his foot and ankle were broken, and a hole was made in his arm below the elbow, which took two months to heal. A front tooth was knocked out and three fingers were smashed. His head was injured, which necessitated the removal of a part of the bone of the skull. Two ribs were cracked. At the time of the trial, and more than a year from the time the injury was received, his back caused continual pain, and he was unable to lift anything with his right hand. He was unable to secure employment because he could not use his right arm.

9. Appeal and error ⚿1004(1).

Verdict cannot be set aside for excessive damages, unless it raises strong presumption that it was result of passion, prejudice, or corruption.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action by R. L. Bence against Teddy's Taxi and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

See, also, 101 Cal. App. 748, 283 P. 86.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Fred J. Harris and Downey & Chester, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

Mr. Justice Pro Tem. TUTTLE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action brought to recover damages on account of personal injuries received by plaintiff when he was struck by an automobile. The trial was had by the court, and, upon the findings made, judgment was entered for plaintiff in the sum of $6,800.

At a former trial of this action, an appeal was taken to this court, and judgment in favor of plaintiff was reversed upon the sole ground that he was guilty of contributory negligence. Bence v. Teddy's Taxi, 101 Cal. App. 748, 282 P. 392, 283 P. 86.

The court, upon the second trial, found that plaintiff was entitled to recover under the doctrine of "last clear chance," and it is first urged by appellant that the facts of this case do not justify the application of that doctrine. The finding thus assailed reads as follows:

"That on June 16, 1928, at about the hour of 5:35 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, plaintiff was a passenger on a street car traveling in a westerly direction over and upon said 'K' Street, between Eighth and Seventh Streets in said City of Sacramento, and when said street car arrived at or near the intersection of Seventh Street with said 'K' Street, plaintiff alighted from said street car and negligently and carelessly proceeded in a northerly direction towards the sidewalk on the northerly side of said 'K' Street, at or near its intersection with said Seventh Street, and at said time plaintiff negligently and carelessly failed and neglected to use ordinary care for his own safety and carelessly and negligently failed to observe the approach of a certain taxicab which was then and there being driven and operated by the defendant Phil Khoury in a westerly direction along said 'K' Street, between said Eighth and Seventh Streets, and at said time plaintiff negligently and carelessly failed to look in the direction from which said taxicab was approaching. At said time plaintiff was in the path of said oncoming taxicab and was in a position of danger from which he could not escape by the exercise of ordinary care.

"That as plaintiff was alighting from said street car, and so walking towards said sidewalk, defendant Phil Khoury was negligently and carelessly operating and driving said taxicab in a westerly direction along said 'K' Street, towards Seventh Street and was at said time operating said taxicab at a speed in excess of twenty-five miles per hour and defendant Phil Khoury observed and saw plaintiff as he alighted from said street car and at all times thereafter until he was hit by said taxicab and defendant Khoury knew that plaintiff did not see or know of the approach of said taxicab as plaintiff was so proceeding northerly along 'K' Street and defendant Khoury knew during all of such time that plaintiff was in a position of danger from which plaintiff could not escape by the exercise of ordinary care and during all of such time defendant Khoury had a clear chance and opportunity to avoid injuring plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care, and during all of such time defendant Khoury could have avoided injuring plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care; that defendant Khoury failed to avoid injuring plaintiff by the use of ordinary care and did not use ordinary care to avoid injuring plaintiff, but did so negligently and carelessly operate and drive said taxicab so as to strike plaintiff and did injure plaintiff to the extent hereinafter set forth. That plaintiff did notice the approach of said taxicab before he was struck by it and thereafter exercised ordinary care and diligence in an endeavor to escape from it but was not by the exercise of ordinary care able to escape from said taxicab or extricate himself from said position of danger. That the negligence of plaintiff hereinbefore referred to did not proximately cause or contribute to the accident or injuries to plaintiff."

[1] We are of the opinion that there is ample evidence in the record to support this finding. Respondent alighted from a street car at the corner of Seventh and K streets in the city of Sacramento, when the car stopped at the safety station at that point. He started to walk at once toward the sidewalk, the curb being some eighteen feet distant. Without looking in the direction from which the taxicab was approaching, he walked some eight feet, when he saw it bearing down upon him. He attempted to jump to the sidewalk, but was struck before he reached it. All of these movements were seen and known to the driver of the taxicab, who was driving at a speed which the court found to be in excess of twenty-five miles an hour. There was testimony to the effect that at a speed of twenty-five miles an hour the taxicab could be stopped within a distance of eighteen feet. The taxicab approached the car from the rear, and it had followed behind the car until the latter stopped at the safety zone, which was some forty-five feet in length. There is sufficient evidence in the record which would justify the trial court in finding that the driver could have stopped the taxicab in time to have avoided striking plaintiff. At the time of the accident, the lawful rate of speed for the taxicab, while passing a standing car, was not in excess of ten miles an hour.

The driver testified that he was driving at a speed of ten miles per hour when passing the street car. If we accept his version as to speed, there is not the slightest doubt, from the evidence adduced, that the injury could have been easily avoided. It is a case where the driver, who was very inexperienced, took a chance and failed in the attempt.

Plaintiff testified that June 16, 1928, the day of the accident, was a "beautiful day," and that the sun was up; that, as he stepped off the street car, he stepped into the pedestrian lane. He further testified: "A. I had my left hand holding on the right-hand side of the front door of the car, facing towards the Bon Marché Store, a little north and west, and I stepped out about the center of the street—I stepped about two steps and looked around, turned by back around, and there was this automobile coming at a terrible rate of speed, about sixteen or eighteen feet from me, and I started to proceed across the street—he was coming right into the lane, and I couldn't get out of the way very well, he was coming so fast, and he turned his car and run it towards the curb, and about a foot and a half from the curb, he hit me about on that manhole there in the street, and hit my right leg on the knee here; he knocked me down with his car. * * * A. I got off right here and stepped into the pedestrian lane. I got off, just off the pedestrian lane. I didn't go in the safety zone, I stepped off the car in the pedestrian lane, right in here, and started across, between six and eight feet, before I seen the car, see, then I turned around and see the car coming, coming too fast. Mr. Gibson, interposing: He said he went six or eight feet before he seen the car?

"Witness: A. Yes. I should judge two steps across, and I turned around and there was the car onto me, about eighteen feet from me when I seen it, sixteen or eighteen feet. I didn't measure it, about that distance, coming at an awful rapid speed; I didn't know what to do, I jumped for my life, to keep from being hit, and he run in the curb, he turned his car to the right and he ran to the curb, ran into the curb line."

[2] The elements of the last clear chance rule have been announced in California on innumerable occasions, and are settled beyond dispute. As said in Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 700, 218 P. 36, the last clear chance rule presupposes: (1) That plaintiff has been negligent; (2) that, as a result of his negligence, he is in a position of danger, from which he cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care; (3) that defendant is aware of plaintiff's dangerous situation under such circumstances that he realizes, or ought to realize, plaintiff's inability to escape therefrom; (4) that defendant then has a clear chance to avoid injuring plaintiff by exercise of ordinary care and fails to do so.

If all of these elements are present, the rule applies and enables plaintiff to recover, notwithstanding his own negligence, but, if any of them be absent, the rule does not apply, and the case is governed by the ordinary rules of negligence and contributory negligence.

[3] It is contended by defendant that the third element mentioned in the Palmer Case is not present here. His entire argument is predicated upon the theory that plaintiff, when he alighted from the street car, stood still upon the safety zone. There is testimony in the record to the effect that plaintiff did not stop, but started to walk toward the sidewalk as soon as he stepped from the street car. All of this was seen by the driver of the taxicab. He was aware of plaintiff's dangerous position, and realized, or ought to have realized, plaintiff's inability to escape therefrom. The instant that plaintiff started to walk from the safety station to the sidewalk, he was in a position of danger. Under such circumstances, it was clearly the duty of the driver to stop his taxicab, instead of attempting to dodge around plaintiff, at an unlawful rate of speed.

The case of Green v. L. A. Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 41, 76 P. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68, relied upon by appellant, was one where the plaintiff was standing still upon the safety zone. There was nothing to indicate that he was attempting to cross the street in front of the taxicab. The Supreme Court simply held that the driver had the right to assume that plaintiff would continue to so stand until he (the driver) had passed the zone. In the instant case, plaintiff, as we have pointed out, did not stand still upon alighting, but proceeded forthwith to cross to the sidewalk. The driver knew that plaintiff was walking directly across his path. To say that under such circumstances plaintiff was not in danger would rob the doctrine of last clear chance of every vestige of its humanitarian aspect, and would relegate its obvious import to a mere quibble.

This case comes squarely within the rule laid down by this court in the case of Smith v. Los Angeles Ry., 288 P. 690, where it is stated: "For this ground of liability to exist it need not appear that it was physically impossible for plaintiff to have escaped danger, but it is sufficient in this connection if it appears that plaintiff was unaware of the danger and for that reason was unable to escape."

Other attacks of a like nature are made by appellant upon the findings, but they are similarly devoid of merit.

[4] Witness Demas was permitted to testify as to the distance within which he could stop a taxicab similar to that driven in this case, while driving at a given speed. This witness was one of the partners who owned and operated the taxicab involved in the collision. He had driven taxicabs of the same type, and had driven automobiles for some fourteen years. We are of the opinion that there was sufficient proof to justify his testimony as an expert.

[5-7] The next ground for reversal urged by appellant is that there is no evidence in the record to support the finding that the driver of the taxicab was in the employ of defendant at the time of the accident. It would appear that such facts are admitted by the answer. The complaint states that the driver was in the employ of defendant at the time of the injury, and the answer denies those allegations upon information and belief only. Such facts are presumptively within the knowledge of defendant, and he must answer positively, and a denial of the same upon information and belief will be treated as an evasion. Curtis v. Richards, 9 Cal. 38. The entire question was given careful and exhaustive consideration by this court in the case of Zany v. Rawhide Gold Mining Co., 15 Cal. App. 373, 114 P. 1026. Furthermore, this question is raised for the first time upon appeal. The record would seem to indicate that the case was tried upon the theory that these were admitted facts. Under such circumstances, the objection cannot prevail.

[8, 9] It is next contended that the damages are excessive. The plaintiff testified that his foot and ankle were broken. A hole was made in his arm below the elbow, which took two months to heal. A front tooth was knocked out, and three fingers were smashed. His head was injured, which necessitated the removal of a part of the bone of the skull. Two ribs were cracked. At the time of the trial, and more than a year from the time the injury was received, his back caused continual pain, and he was unable to lift anything with his right hand. He was unable to secure employment because he could not use his right arm. We cannot say that under such circumstances the verdict is excessive, nor are we able to say that the award was so grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as presented to us on appeal as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong presumption that it was the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than honest or sober judgment. Under such circumstances, we are powerless to revise the award thus made. Kelley v. Hodge Trans. System, 197 Cal. 598, 242 P. 76.

Other objections are made by appellant with reference to the admission of testimony respecting the pain and suffering endured by respondent, but we can find no substantial merit in any of them.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by E. Y. Foley against J. M. Euless and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellant.

Julius Hansen and Gallaher & Jertberg, all of Fresno, for respondents.

MARKS, J.

Appellant filed suit in the court below seeking the recovery of $100,000 damages for an alleged breach of contract. Respondents filed a general and special demurrer to an amended complaint, which demurrer was sustained without leave to amend. From the judgment entered in favor of respondents, appellant prosecuted this appeal.

A written contract bearing the date of October 9, 1929, forms the basis of appellant's cause of action. E. Y. Foley, the first party named therein, was a packer and shipper of dried fruits, with a packing house in Fresno, Cal. Respondents are described in the contract as "J. M. Euless and Henry Dermer, associated together as the Euless-Dermer Pool of the same county and State, parties of the second part." The contract is signed by the respective parties individually without any indication, as far as the signatures are concerned that they were acting in a representative capacity. The body of the agreement discloses that the second parties were acting as the representatives of a number of growers of raisin grapes who were associated together and acting for their joint benefit and protection under the name of the Euless-Dermer Pool. As the decision of this case will turn on the construction to be placed upon this contract, it will be necessary for us to detail its provisions.

The members of the pool were engaged in raising Thompson Seedless, Sultana, and Muscat grapes and curing them into raisins. They desired to secure packing and marketing facilities for their crops. To effect this purpose appellant agreed to receive at his packing house such of the raisins of the pool members "which the said second parties (respondents) will have the members of the said above-mentioned pool deliver to the first party's (appellant's) packing house not later than January 1st, 1930." Upon such delivery appellant agreed to weigh the raisins and grade them as either extra standard, standard, or sub-standard. In case of any disagreement as to the grades, a regrading by the representatives of the two parties to the contract and a third grader selected by the pool's representative was provided for. Appellant obligated himself to issue to each pool member so delivering raisins a negotiable warehouse receipt and a standard weight tag, showing the amount, kind, and grade of raisins so delivered. Appellant further agreed that he would put the raisins through the standard processes to prepare them for market, and that he would pack them either in cartons or twenty-five pound boxes as and when directed by respondents. Appellant agreed to store, warehouse, and protect them from the elements, and that he would be responsible for the safety of the raisins and guard them against theft and insure them against loss by fire at his own cost and expense. Appellant further agreed to secure purchasers for the raisins. All bids were to be submitted to an executive committee of the pool consisting of respondents and one other, and no bid could be accepted without the consent of the committee. When sold the purchase price was to be paid to the pool. He further agreed that upon the sale of the raisins by the executive committee he would load the raisins on cars for shipment. All expenses of handling, processing, packing, preparing for market, and marketing the raisins were to be paid by appellant, except that the "pool shall pay the regular buyer's two per cent. (2%) cash discount and a broker's commission incurred in the sale of the raisins." It was further agreed that all drafts drawn for the payment of the raisins should be drawn in favor of the pool. The contract also contained the following provisions:

"It is further understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that in consideration of the said second parties obtaining the delivery of the pool members' raisins to the said first party's packing house, that the said first party will not handle any other natural dried raisins of Thompson Seedless, Sultanas and Muscat varieties, during the term of this contract at his above mentioned packing plant.

"The said second parties will pay to the said first party therefor the sum of 1¼c per pound on all raisins packed in twenty-five pound boxes and 1½c per pound on all raisins packed in cartons and that the said consideration shall be paid to the said first party by the said second parties, as the said raisins are sold and paid for.

"It is understood and agreed that this agreement shall continue in full force and effect until all of the raisins delivered to first party by the Pool members shall have been processed and sold and delivered to the buyers of the same."

A copy of the contract is attached to the amended complaint as an exhibit.

It is alleged in the amended complaint that the pool members raised and cured, and respondents had under their control, ten thousand tons of the varieties of raisins mentioned in the contract; that appellant could and would have received all of these raisins at his packing plant prior to January 1, 1930, and "could and would have weighed and graded all said raisins, and could and would have performed all the necessary work of putting the said raisins through the standard process, and could and would have prepared said raisins for marketing, and could and would have packed all said raisins in cartons and boxes, and could and would in all respects and particulars have handled said raisins in the manner mentioned and called for in and by said contract," if he had not been prevented in so doing by the respondents. It is further alleged that respondents caused the growers to deliver four hundred tons of the raisins to appellant's warehouse, "but said defendants failed and refused to deliver or cause to be delivered, and did not deliver, nor cause to be delivered, nor suffer or permit to be delivered, at plaintiff's packing plant or to plaintiff, any other or further amount of the raisins of said pool members or any raisins, and said defendants did advise, direct, and cause the said pool members to refrain from delivering other or further raisins to plaintiff, or at said packing plant, and that no raisins, except said 400 tons, or thereabouts, were ever delivered or caused to be delivered or permitted by defendants to be delivered at said packing plant." It is further alleged that respondents "refused to permit or allow plaintiff to process, pack or otherwise prepare for marketing any of said raisins, either of said 400 tons which were so delivered, or of any part of the remaining 9,600 tons of said pool members' raisins, or other raisins; and said defendants prevented plaintiff from doing anything relative to the processing, packing or preparing for marketing of raisins." It is further alleged that on January 1, 1930, respondents notified appellant that they would not proceed under nor comply with the terms of the contract, and that they repudiated the same and would not permit appellant to proceed thereunder and prior to January 20, 1930, caused the four hundred tons already delivered to be removed. It is not alleged that appellant graded or insured the four hundred tons of raisins which were delivered.

This appeal presents two questions for our consideration: First, the liability of respondents to appellant, if any, as to the nine thousand six hundred tons of raisins which were not delivered to appellant's warehouse, and, second, as to the four hundred tons which were delivered but were subsequently removed.

Appellant concedes that the contract, by its express terms, did not obligate respondents to have delivered to the warehouse all, or any definite quantity, of the growers' raisins. He contends that, as the agreement prohibited him receiving at the described packing house any other raisins of the varieties named, and that as the agreement was to remain in force and effect until all the raisins delivered had been processed, sold, and delivered to buyers, there was an implied covenant on the part of the respondents to cause all of the growers' raisins to be delivered to him.

[1, 2] Courts have been careful not to rewrite contracts for parties by inserting an implied provision, unless, from the language employed, such implied provision is necessary to carry out the intention of the parties. No implied condition can be inserted as against the express terms of the contract or to supply a covenant upon which it was intentionally silent. The rule is thus stated by the Court of Appeals of New York in Genet v. Delaware & Hudson Canal Co., 136 N. Y. 593, 32 N. E. 1078, 1081, 19 L. R. A. 127: "I know very well that implied promises are to be cautiously and not hastily raised. What they are was very well stated in Scrantom v. Booth, 29 Barb. [N. Y.] 174; in Allamon v. Albany, 43 Barb. [N. Y.] 36; and in Booth v. Cleveland Roll. Mills Co., 6 Hun. [N. Y.] 597. They always exist where equity and justice require the party to do or to refrain from doing the thing in question; where the covenant on one side involves some corresponding obligation on the other; where by the relations of the parties and the subject-matter of the contract a duty is owing by one not expressly bound by the contract to the other party in reference to the subject of it. In this court we have thrown some safeguards about the doctrine to secure its prudent application, and have said that a promise can be implied only where we may rightfully assume that it would have been made if attention had been drawn to it (Der-mott v. State, 99 N. Y. 101, 1 N. E. 242), and that it is to be raised only to enforce a manifest equity, or to reach a result which the unequivocal acts of the parties indicate that they intended to effect (King v. Leighton, 100 N. Y. 386, 3 N. E. 594)."

This rule was recognized in the case of Loyalton, etc., Co. v. California, etc., Co., 22 Cal. App. 75, 133 P. 323, 324, where it was said: "Where parties have entered into written engagements which industriously express the obligations which each is to assume, the courts should be reluctant to enlarge them by implication as to important matters. The presumption is that, having expressed some, they have expressed all, of the conditions by which they intended to be bound."

[3] With these rules of law in mind we cannot conclude that there was an implied obligation on the part of respondents to cause the pool members to deliver all of their raisins to appellant. The omission of such a covenant might have been intentional on the part of respondents, as the quantity of raisins to be delivered might be determined by them and be governed entirely by the good faith of appellant in performing his obligations and his success in marketing those delivered. The executed contract was clear in its terms and left to the judgment of respondents the quantity of raisins to be delivered. Had appellant desired a covenant requiring a given number of tons of raisins or all of the growers' raisins delivered to him, he should have had such a provision inserted in the contract. We cannot rewrite the agreement for him.

The liability of respondents to appellant for his prospective profits on the four hundred tons of raisins delivered presents questions entirely different from the one raised by the failure to deliver the nine thousand six hundred tons. Both parties assume that the respondents acted as agents for the growers in executing the contract in question.

[4, 5] An agent who contracts as such for his principal within the scope of his authority does not incur a personal liability by reason of the agreement. Jewell v. Colonial Theater Co., 12 Cal. App. 681, 108 P. 527. The same is true of one who is dealt with and treated as an agent by the other party to the agreement. Tevis v. Savage, 130 Cal. 411, 62 P. 611.

Where, however, an agent acts for an undisclosed principal, it becomes his duty to disclose the name of his principal at the time of the execution of the contract or he will be bound by the obligations of the contract as a principal. Murphy v. Helmrich, 66 Cal. 69, 4 P. 958; Kerry v. Pacific Marine Co., 121 Cal. 564, 54 P. 89, 66 Am. St. Rep. 65; Coover v. Cox, 95 Cal. App. 1, 272 P. 343; Heringer v. Schumacher, 88 Cal. App. 349, 263 P. 550. It is under this last rule that appellant seeks to hold respondent for the damage suffered by the alleged breach of contract.

[6] It affirmatively appears from the contract that respondents were acting in a representative capacity for the members of the pool in executing the agreement. The names of the members of the pool were not disclosed to appellant at the time of the execution of the contract as far as appears from the allegations of the complaint. However, the contract provided that appellant issue to each pool member a standard weight tag and a negotiable warehouse receipt upon the delivery of raisins. The form of a negotiable warehouse receipt is fixed by law and the law fixes certain of the rights of the issues and holder of such a receipt. 25 Cal. Jur. pp. 947–952; Stats. 1909, p. 437; sections 1858b, 1858c, Civ. Code. As the issuance of these negotiable warehouse receipts to the growers was provided for and required by the terms of the contract, and as the issuance of these receipts changed the rights, obligations, and duties of the appellant, respondents, and growers to each other as expressed in the contract, we cannot consider the contract as complete or expressing the full intention of the parties until the issuance of these receipts, nor can we construe the contract separate from the receipts and the effect given them by law. We must therefore consider the expressed terms of the contract enlarged and extended by the receipts which it required appellant to issue to the pool members. The same may be said of the standard weight tags. Upon the issuance of the warehouse receipt and the weight tag, the name of the pool member, one of the principals of respondents in the transaction, became disclosed to appellant. The contract required him to record these names and the kinds and amounts of raisins delivered to him by each pool member and deliver a copy of such to respondents. Thus the names of respondents' principals were disclosed to him under the very terms of the contract in which he seeks to fasten liability upon the agents. The law does not permit him to hold the agents acting as such for disclosed and named principals. The complaint, therefore, failed to state a cause of action against respondents.

The liability to appellant of the pool members who first delivered their raisins to him and then removed them from his warehouse has not been considered by us.

Judgment affirmed.

McALVAY v. CONSUMERS' SALT CO. et al.

Civ. 7651.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 9, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 8, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 4, 1931.

1. Execution 🔑283.

Evidence supported finding that judgment debtor was owner of corporate stock at time execution was levied.

2. Husband and wife 🔑262(1).

Corporate stock obtained during coverture was presumptively community property notwithstanding it stood in name of judgment debtor's wife (Civ. Code, § 164).

3. Husband and wife 🔑262(1).

Presumption that corporate stock standing in name of judgment debtor's wife was community property was disputable (Civ. Code, § 164).

4. Husband and wife 🔑262(1).

Presumption that corporate stock standing in name of judgment debtor's wife is community property may outweigh contrary evidence (Civ. Code, § 164).

5. Husband and wife 🔑270(9).

When presumption that corporate stock standing in name of judgment debtor's wife is community property is controverted by evidence, issue of fact is raised.

6. Appeal and error 🔑931(1).

Appellate court must give liberal construction to finding in support of judgment.

7. Execution 🔑283.

In execution purchaser's suit to quiet title to corporate stock, express finding should have been made on question whether original transfer of title to third party was made for benefit of judgment debtor.

8. Execution 🔑283.

Evidence held to establish that corporate stock sold at execution sale was previously purchased in name of third party and held for benefit of judgment debtor (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a; Const. art. 6, § 4¾).

9. Execution 🔑250.

Equity will not enforce execution sale where disproportion between value of property and sum paid for it is so great as to shock conscience.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1012(1).

Weight of testimony is for trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

11. Execution 🔑250.

Mere inadequacy in price paid on execution sale does not furnish ground for setting aside sale.

12. Execution 🔑283.

Finding that execution sale of judgment debtor's interest in 225,000 shares of corporate stock for $50 was not so inadequate as to render transaction unconscionable held supported.

13. Execution 🔑283.

In execution purchaser's action against judgment debtor's wife to quiet title to corporate stock, evidence as to conversations, between debtor who was officer of corporation and another officer, which were parts of equivocal transaction leading up to purchase of stock, held admissible.

The evidence was admissible, since it tended to establish that the judgment debtor, and not his mother-in-law in whose name the stock was originally purchased, but who subsequently transferred stock to debtor's wife, was the owner of the stock.

14. Appeal and error 🔑1051(3).

In execution purchaser's action to quiet title to corporate stock, where entry of judgment against debtor and issuance of execution thereon were admitted, admission of judgment roll, if erroneous, held harmless.

15. Execution 🔑283.

In execution purchaser's action against judgment debtor's wife to quiet title to corporate stock, testimony of officer of corporation that wife was questioned by purchaser respecting interest of her mother, who transferred stock to wife held relevant.

16. Quieting title 🔑44(2).

Evidence of circumstances under which deed to property conveyed in part payment of corporate stock transferred to name of judgment debtor's mother-in-law held competent in execution purchaser's action to quiet title to corporate stock against judgment debtor's wife subsequently holding stock.

17. Appeal and error 🔑1056(1).

Exclusion of judgment debtor's testimony that he intended transfer of corporate stock from mother-in-law to vest stock in his wife as her separate property, if error, held harmless, in view of other testimony.

The judgment debtor had previously testified that from the time of the purchase of the corporate stock to the date of the trial he neither had nor claimed any interest in the stock.

18. Trial 🔑59(2).

Order of proof is discretionary with trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 2042).

19. Execution 🔑264.

Execution purchaser acquired only right of judgment debtor (Code Civ. Proc. § 699).

20. Quieting title 🔑10(1).

Plaintiff in action to quiet title must recover on strength of his own title.

21. Quieting title 🔑10(1).

Plaintiff in action to quiet title cannot recover on weakness of adversary's title.

22. Execution 🔑283.

Execution purchaser must show, as against stranger to judgment, that judgment debtor had title or possession on date of lien or execution sale.

23. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑208.

Generally, only creditors at time of alleged fraudulent transfer or subsequent creditors intended to be defrauded can complain thereof.

24. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑69(1).

To make voluntary conveyance void as to subsequent creditors, it must be made with intent of fraudulently preventing them from enforcing claims.

25. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑109.

Judgment debtor's property is liable to debts of subsequent as well as existing creditors, where only nominal title is conveyed to another.

26. Execution 🔑41.

Where trust was merely passive, interest of cestui que trust in corporate stock was subject to sale under execution (Code Civ. Proc. § 688).

27. Execution 🔑53.

As regards judgment creditor's right to subject corporate stock to execution sale, transferee, not being bona fide purchaser, stood in no better position than transferor.

28. Quieting title 🔑10(2).

Generally, owner of equitable title cannot maintain action to quiet title against owner of legal title.

29. Husband and wife 🔑249.

Where corporate stock was purchased at time when under laws husband was sole owner of community property, title vested in husband, notwithstanding transfer to wife.

30. Husband and wife 🔑269.

Community property, although standing in name of wife, could be taken in satisfaction of execution against husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by B. D. McAlvay against the Consumers' Salt Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Newby & Newby and Dee Holder, all of Los Angeles, for appellant B. C. Stockwell.

John C. Packard, of Los Angeles, for appellant Consumers' Salt Co.

Harry M. Irwin and Andrew H. Rose, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff brought the above action to quiet title to 225,000 shares of the capital stock of defendant corporation and to compel the issuance to him of a certificate therefor. The complaint alleged the ownership of the stock to be in plaintiff, and that defendant B. C. Stockwell, to whom a certificate therefor had been issued by defendant corporation, claimed an interest therein, which was without right. The defendants by their answer denied the material allegations of the complaint, and admitted that defendant B. C. Stockwell claimed an interest in the stock, which they alleged to be the full ownership thereof. The action was tried on these issues.

The court found plaintiff to be the owner of the stock, and that B. C. Stockwell (who will be hereinafter referred to as the defendant) had no interest therein and wrongfully withheld the certificate mentioned. Judgment was entered quieting plaintiff's title as against the defendants, and requiring the corporation (hereinafter referred to as the company) to issue a new certificate to the plaintiff.

The defendant since 1901 has been the wife of V. E. Stockwell, and R. P. Greenleaf, hereinafter mentioned, is defendant's mother. On June 18, 1925, plaintiff recovered a judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county against V. E. Stockwell for $16,000 and costs. The judgment was docketed on June 19, 1925. On September 25, 1925, an execution issued thereon, pursuant to which the sheriff of that county, according to his return, levied upon all of the interest of V. E. Stockwell in and to the 225,000 shares of the capital stock of the Consumers' Salt Company, evidenced by certificate number 40, issued to and standing in the name of V. E. Stockwell, and on November 17, 1925, sold the same to the plaintiff herein. The stock in question was formerly held by a corporation called the Crystal Salt Company, which owned a total of 300,000 shares of the company represented by certificate number 14. Some time before September 27, 1918, C. B. T. Jones recovered a judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county against the Crystal Salt Company for $5,250 and costs, and on November 7, 1918, the sheriff of that county, under an execution issued in the action, caused the above 300,000 shares to be sold. The court in the present action found "* * * that at said sale said 300,000 shares were purchased in the name of R. P. Greenleaf; * * * that thereafter, to wit, on June 30, 1919, said certificate number 14 for 300,000 shares of the capital stock of defendant Consumers' Salt Company was canceled, and certificate number 36 for said 300,000 shares of the capital stock of defendant Consumers' Salt Company was issued to R. P. Greenleaf; * * * that thereafter, to wit, on August 13, 1923, said certificate number 36 was canceled, and certificate number 38 for 75,000 shares of said stock was issued to C. L. Mulholland, and certificate number 39 for 225,000 shares of said stock issued to said R. P. Greenleaf; * * * that on July 9, 1925, said certificate number 39 for said 225,000 shares was canceled, and certificate number 40 for said 225,000 shares was issued on said date to defendant B. C. Stockwell; * * * that at all times while said certificate number 39 was outstanding said 225,000 shares, which are evidenced by said certificate number 39, were owned by V. E. Stockwell. * * *" The court also found that these shares were not owned by R. P. Greenleaf or B. C. Stockwell at any time, and that on the date of the execution sale thereof to plaintiff the same were owned by V. E. Stockwell.

Plaintiff claims that, notwithstanding the stock was purchased in the name of Mrs. Greenleaf and subsequently transferred by her to defendant, it was at all times the community property of the latter and B. C. Stockwell; while defendant claims the same as her separate property acquired by gift from her mother.

As grounds for the appeal it is contended that the findings and judgment in favor of plaintiff are unsupported; that upon the findings made and as the legal effect of the execution sale of the stock to Mrs. Greenleaf judgment should have been entered for the defendants; that in equity and good conscience plaintiff is not entitled to any relief; and that the court erred in the admission and rejection of evidence, and abused its discretion in permitting plaintiff to introduce evidence out of order.

The evidence shows that in 1918 V. E. Stockwell and C. L. Mulholland were respectively the president and general manager and director of both the Consumers' Salt Company and the Crystal Salt Company. In October of that year while such officers they purchased the judgment held by C. T. B. Jones against the Crystal Salt Company, the consideration being $2,500 in cash, furnished by Mulholland, and a house and lot which B. C. Stockwell caused to be transferred to Lillian P. Jones. By agreement between the purchasers the judgment was assigned to Mrs. Greenleaf. Mulholland testified that the transfer to her was due to a suggestion by Stockwell, who said: "It would not look good for us as officers of the company to take that judgment in our names. Let us take it in Mrs. Greenleaf's name." The payment by Mulholland was represented by a check made payable to Mrs. Greenleaf, which check was delivered to Stockwell; both the payee and Stockwell indorsed the check, and the latter cashed the same. With the proceeds Stockwell purchased a cashier's check for the same amount payable to Mrs. Greenleaf, which he indorsed as her attorney in fact. This check with the deed to the real property mentioned was placed by him in escrow, and was ultimately exchanged for the assignment of the judgment. Subsequently an attorney, acting under Stockwell's instructions, caused the execution to issue on the judgment, and on November 13, 1918, bid in the stock at the execution sale in the name of Mrs. Greenleaf. The latter, who was about seventy years of age and a widow, had since her husband's death in 1901 made her home with the Stockwells. She paid nothing for her board or room, and, so far as defendant could recall, had not owned or possessed any property other than the stock in question during that period. In 1905 she executed to V. E. Stockwell her general power of attorney, and took no part in the purchase of the Jones judgment or the execution sale thereunder, nor was the certificate number 36 for the stock issued in her name or received or seen by her, the same being receipted for and retained by Stockwell. It further appears that on August 13, 1923, Stockwell and Mulholland, in the absence of Mrs. Greenleaf and without consulting with her, divided the 300,000 shares represented by certificate No. 36, whereupon 75,000 shares thereof were issued to Mulholland, and certificate No. 39 for the 225,000 shares issued in the name of Mrs. Greenleaf. At this time certificate No. 36 was indorsed for cancellation by Stockwell, and thereupon the latter, acting as secretary, and Mulholland, acting as president of the company, issued said certificate No. 39, which was received and receipted for by Stockwell. The latter voted the stock at a subsequent stockholders' meeting, at which Mrs. Greenleaf was elected a director of the company, but during the time the stock stood in her name she attended none of the meetings of the company, being represented thereafter by Stockwell. It appears, however, that, when certificate No. 40 was issued to defendant, certificate No. 39 was personally indorsed by Mrs. Greenleaf. The house and lot referred to was purchased by Stockwell from Mrs. Julia Norton on November 6, 1917, the consideration therefor being an unsecured note for $1,000 executed by Stockwell and the defendant, which note Stockwell subsequently paid. According to Mrs. Norton the deed was prepared by Stockwell, who read the same to her before its execution, stating that the name of the grantee therein was V. E. Stockwell. The record of the notary public before whom the deed was acknowledged shows, however, that the grantee originally named therein was B. C. Stockwell, but that this name was subsequently changed on the notarial record to Nellie B. Jones. It further appears from the deed that the name of the original grantee was erased therefrom and Mrs. Greenleaf's name substituted. According to Stockwell he made the change in the deed with Mrs. Norton's consent; but the latter testified that she knew nothing of Mrs. Greenleaf until several months after the execution, and that no change was made in the name of the grantee in her presence or with her knowledge. As stated, a deed to the same property was executed to Lillian P. Jones by Mrs. Greenleaf in October, 1918. It is also claimed by defendant that the amount furnished by Mulholland was loaned to Mrs. Greenleaf; but it is clear that no note or security therefor was asked or given, and Mulholland denied that such loan was made. It is clear from Mrs. Greenleaf's testimony that her knowledge of any of these transactions was of the vaguest description. She never saw the property acquired from Mrs. Norton, or the assignment of the Jones judgment, or knew its amount. The stock was received and held by Stockwell, and with one exception indorsed by him. It was also voted by him at all the meetings of the company. Furthermore, Mrs. Greenleaf proved to be almost wholly unfamiliar with the facts of the acquisition of the Jones judgment, and her lack of knowledge of the other transactions described tends strongly to support the conclusion that she was not the real party in interest.

[1] The reason advanced for her lack of knowledge is the fact that she had given her power of attorney to Stockwell, in whom, according to her testimony, she had full confidence. The power was given in 1905; but it sufficiently appears that she had no property or business; and the inference that its purpose was to enable Stockwell to transact business under her name when convenient is not unreasonable, and the conclusion that such was the fact, and that, although the stock was purchased in her name, it was Stockwell's property and held for his benefit, is fairly supported by the evidence.

[2–5] The judgment recovered by plaintiff against Stockwell was docketed on June 19, 1925, and on July 9, 1925, the stock was transferred to defendant. As stated, she claimed that the same was a gift from her mother. There was, however, no documentary evidence supporting this claim; and being a transfer of personal property there was no presumption that the title vested in her as her separate property, as the provision of section 164 of the Civil Code (Stats. 1897, p. 63; Stats. 1917, p. 827; Stats. 1923, p. 746) that "whenever any property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property," had reference to transfers of real property only. Booker v. Castillo, 154 Cal. 672, 98 P. 1067; Stafford v. Martinoni, 192 Cal. 724, 221 P. 919. The stock therefore was presumptively community property (Estate of Pepper, 158 Cal. 619, 112 P. 62, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092), notwithstanding it stood in defendant's name (Fennell v. Drinkhouse, 131 Cal. 447, 63 P. 734, 82 Am. St. Rep. 361; Rowe v. Hibernia, etc., Soc., 134 Cal. 403, 66 P. 569; Bashore v. Parker, 146 Cal. 525, 80 P. 707; Hammond v. McCollough, 159 Cal. 639, 115 P. 216; Stafford v. Martinoni, supra). While such presumptions are disputable (Thompson v. Davis, 172 Cal. 491, 157 P. 595), they may nevertheless outweigh the evidence adduced against them (Pabst v. Shearer, 172 Cal. 239, 156 P. 466); and when controverted by evidence, direct or indirect, an issue of fact is raised which it is the duty of the trial court to determine as in other cases (Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 P. 308); and notwithstanding such evidence a presumption will support a finding made in accordance therewith (Moore v. Gould, 151 Cal. 723, 91 P. 616; Estate of Wiechers, 199 Cal. 523, 250 P. 397; Grantham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758, 182 P. 73; Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. De Ryana [Cal. Sup.] 292 P. 632).

Defendants contends that no facts were found which contravene the finding that the stock was purchased in the name of Mrs. Greenleaf, and that the legal effect of the purchase was to vest ownership in her. This transaction took place on November 13, 1918, and there was no express finding that Stockwell owned the stock previous to August 13, 1923, the date when certificate No. 39 was issued, the finding being that at all times while this certificate was outstanding he was the owner of the stock evidenced thereby. The court also found that it was not true that the stock was owned by Mrs. Greenleaf until July 19, 1925, as alleged by defendant, or at all.

[6–8] While an appellate court must give a liberal construction to findings in support of the judgment (Haight v. Haight, 151 Cal. 90, 90 P. 197; Adler v. Sawyer, 40 Cal. App. 778, 181 P. 817), and, as urged by respondent, these findings might be so construed, nevertheless we agree with appellant that an express finding on the question of ownership at the time of the purchase should have been made. However, under section 4¾ of article 6 of the Constitution, and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, we have the power in disposing of appeals to make findings. As stated, the evidence amply supports the conclusion that, although the stock in question was purchased in the name of Mrs. Greenleaf, it was the property of Stockwell, and was held by her for his benefit and we so find.

The record shows that $500 was bid for the 302,000 shares sold under the execution issued on the Jones judgment, and that Stockwell's interest in the 225,000 shares was purchased by plaintiff for $50 under the execution issued on the latter's judgment. Defendant claims that the price paid by plaintiff was so inadequate as to render the transaction unconscionable, and that he should for that reason be denied equitable relief.

[9-12] It has been held that a court of equity will not lend its aid to enforce a sale of property under execution where the disproportion between the value of the property sold and the sum paid for it is so great as to shock the conscience. Mississippi, etc., R. Co. v. Cromwell, 91 U. S. 643, 23 L. Ed. 367; Randolph's Executor v. Quidnick Co., 135 U. S. 457, 10 S. Ct. 655, 34 L. Ed. 200. The total number of shares issued by the company does not appear, and the only direct evidence of the value of the stock in litigation was Stockwell's testimony that it was worth $150,000. As against this, however, was evidence that the business showed a deficit for the year ending June 30, 1925, and that the net profits for the following year approximated but $2,200. In addition, Stockwell's testimony was evasive and in many respects contradictory, and the weight to be given thereto was a question for the trial court. Code Civ. Proc. § 1847. There was no suggestion of any irregularity in the conduct of the sale, and no motion was made to vacate it. While inadequacy of price is a circumstance to be considered (Odell v. Cox, 151 Cal. 70, 90 P. 194), mere inadequacy, however great, does not of itself furnish a ground for setting aside such a sale (Rauer v. Hertweck, 175 Cal. 278, 165 P. 946; Bock v. Losekamp, 179 Cal. 674, 179 P. 516; Baldwin v. Brown, 193 Cal. 345, 224 P. 462). No fraud and no unfairness except as to the amount paid is urged against the plaintiff, and the testimony was not such as to compel the finding that the price paid rendered the transaction unconscionable. Such was not the view of the trial court, and no reason appears for disturbing its conclusion.

[13] Complaint is also made that Mulholland was permitted over objection to relate conversations with Stockwell at times when neither the defendant nor Mrs. Greenleaf was present. Several of the conversations related to the financial and other arrangements which led to the purchase of the Jones judgment and the sale thereunder. In a subsequent conversation a division of the stock was discussed, following which the 75,000 shares above mentioned were transferred to Mulholland. The conversations were parts of equivocal transactions relevant and material to the issues and explanatory thereof. Taken in connection with the conduct of the parties to the transactions they tended to show that Stockwell rather than Mrs. Greenleaf was the owner of the stock, and this testimony was properly admitted. 22 Corp. Jur., Evidence, §§ 544, 548, pp. 453, 458; Wigmore Evidence, § 1772.

[14, 15] The judgment roll in plaintiff's action against Stockwell was admitted in evidence. The witness Mulholland was permitted to testify that he and Stockwell were officers of the salt companies in 1918, and the defendant was questioned by plaintiff respecting her mother's property. This evidence was also objected to by appellants. Although the entry of this judgment and the issuance of execution thereon were admitted by appellants the admission of the judgment roll in evidence, if erroneous, was not prejudicial, and the testimony of Mulholland was relevant to the issues.

[16] Nor is there any merit in the contention that evidence of the circumstances under which the Norton deed was executed was incompetent, or that either Stockwell or the defendant were subjected to improper cross-examination.

[17] Testimony offered by Stockwell that he intended and understood the transfer from Mrs. Greenleaf to vest the stock in the defendant as her separate property, and that he made no claim thereto as community property, was rejected. This ruling is also assigned as error. While testimony as to a party's intention has been held to be competent (Horton v. Winbigler, 175 Cal. 149, 165 P. 423; Gilmour v. North Pasadena, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 P. 1066; Parsons v. Robinson, 206 Cal. 378, 274 P. 528), here the witness had previously testified that from the time of the purchase of the stock to the date of the trial he neither had nor claimed any interest in the stock. In view of this testimony the ruling, if erroneous, was not prejudicial.

[18] The order of proof was a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 2042), and no abuse of discretion in this respect is disclosed by the record.

[19-22] As urged by appellant, plaintiff at the execution sale of the stock acquired the right, title, and interest of Stockwell therein and no more (Code Civ. Proc. § 699; Widenmann v. Weniger, 164 Cal. 667, 672, 130 P. 421); and in an action to quiet title must recover on the strength of his own title and not upon the weakness of the title of his adversaries (Di Nola v. Allison, 143 Cal. 106, 76 P. 976, 65 L. R. A. 419, 101 Am. St. Rep. 84; Sears v. Willard, 165 Cal. 12, 130 P. 869). Also where a plaintiff claims under an execution sale he must show as against a stranger to the judgment that the judgment debtor had title or possession at the date of the lien or execution sale. (Robinson v. Thornton, 102 Cal. 675, 681, 34 P. 120; Reilly v. Wright, 117 Cal. 77, 48 P. 970).

[23-25] Appellants further claim that plaintiff, being at most a subsequent creditor of Stockwell, is not under the facts one of the class who could attack the transfer to Mrs. Greenleaf. It is the general rule that the only creditors who can complain are those who were creditors at the time of the alleged fraudulent transfer, or those subsequent thereto who were intended to be defrauded; but to make a voluntary conveyance void as to subsequent creditors it must be made with the intent of fraudulently preventing them from enforcing their claims. Bush & Mallett Co. v. Helbing, 134 Cal. 676, 66 P. 967; Franck v. Moran, 36 Cal. App. 32, 171 P. 841. Otherwise subsequent creditors cannot complain. Kane v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 464; Scales v. Holje, 41 Cal. App. 733, 183 P. 308. But it is also the rule that, though the nominal title to property be conveyed to another, it is nevertheless liable for the debts of its owner (Scott v. Keane, 87 Md. 709, 40 A. 1070, 42 L. R. A. 359; Wetherill v. Canney, 62 Minn. 341, 64 N. W. 818; McKey v. Cochran, 262 Ill. 376, 104 N. E. 693; Spencer v. Davis [Tex. Civ. App.] 298 S. W. 443; Jamison v. Mississippi, etc., Trust Co. [Mo. Sup.] 207 S. W. 788; Ward v. Marie, 73 N. J. Eq. 510, 68 A. 1084; Benedict v. Benedict, 261 Pa. 117, 104 A. 581; Menken Co. v. Brinkley, 94 Tenn. 721, 31 S. W. 92), upon the principle that one cannot be the equitable owner of property and still have it exempt from his debts (27 Cor. Jur., Fraudulent Conveyances, § 344, p. 600; McColgan v. Magee, Inc., 172 Cal. 182, 155 P. 995, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1050). And the rule applies to subsequent as well as to existing creditors (McKey v. Cochran, supra; Williams v. Kemper, 99 Minn. 301, 109 N. W. 242; Petty v. Moores, etc., Sanitarium, 110 Va. 815, 67 S. E. 355, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 800, 19 Ann. Cas. 271; 27 Cor. Jur., Fraudulent, Conveyances, supra), and to both real and personal property (Wetherill v. Canney, supra). As the court said in Rives v. Stephens (Tex. Civ. App.) 28 S. W. 707, 708: "If a conveyance be made with no intention that the title shall pass, but with the understanding that the grantee will hold in trust for the grantor, subsequent as well as prior creditors can subject the property to the payment of their debts, the same as other property of such a cestui que trust." And the doctrine does not depend upon the fraudulent intent of any party connected with the transaction. McColgan v. Magee, Inc., supra.

[26, 27] In the present case it is clear that, notwithstanding the stock was purchased in Mrs. Greenleaf's name, it was Stockwell's property and held for his use and benefit. While the legal title was vested in Mrs. Greenleaf, she was under no duty except to convey it to the person ultimately entitled. Being merely a passive trust, the interest of the cestui que trust was subject to seizure and sale under execution (23 Cor. Jur., Executions, § 84, p. 343), as, under the rule in California, all interests in property, whether legal or equitable, which are not exempt by law are liable to be so taken and sold (Code Civ. Proc. § 688; 15 Cal. Jur., Levy and Seizure, §§ 24, 27, pp. 1015, 1018; Kennedy v. Nunan, 52 Cal. 326; Le Roy v. Dunkerly, 54 Cal. 452; King v. Gotz, 70 Cal. 236, 241, 11 P. 656); and the defendant, not being a bona fide purchaser, stands in no better position than her transferor (Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 163, 3 P. 641; Cal., etc., Fruit Ass'n v. Stelling, 141 Cal. 713, 75 P. 320.

[28-30] In this connection defendant contends that the legal title to the stock was vested in her and not in the plaintiff, and that consequently an action to quiet title will not lie, citing Aalwyn's Law Institute v. Martin, 173 Cal. 21, 159 P. 158, and other cases. It is the general doctrine in California that the owner of an equitable title cannot maintain an action to quiet title against the owner of the legal title, the cases cited holding that a complaint containing only the usual averments in such an action is insufficient as against the owner of the legal title. Among the reasons for the rule the cases state that an allegation or finding of ownership in the plaintiff is not sustained by proof that the defendant owns the legal title subject to an equity in the plaintiff (Robinson v. Muir, 151 Cal. 118, 90 P. 521; Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 108 P. 278); also that it would be unfair to permit the owner of equities to procure a judgment based upon his adversary's fraud without setting up the facts constituting the fraud (Aalwyn's Law Institute v. Martin, supra). In the present case, however, the evidence shows that the stock was purchased on November 13, 1918, at which time under the laws of this state the husband was the sole owner of all community property, the wife having no present vested interest therein (Stewart v. Stewart, 204 Cal. 546, 269 P. 439); and the cases hold that, notwithstanding its transfer to the wife, no title, legal or equitable, vested in her, but the same at once vested in the husband (Peiser v. Griffin, 125 Cal.

9, 57 P. 690; Osborn v. Mills, 20 Cal. App. 346, 128 P. 1009; Mitchell v. Moses, 16 Cal. App. 595, 117 P. 685, 687). Accordingly such property, though it stands in the name of the wife, could be taken in satisfaction of an execution against the husband (Schuyler v. Broughton, 70 Cal. 282, 11 P. 719), and the purchaser at the execution sale acquired all the right, title, and interest of the husband therein (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 698, 699). Furthermore, the right of a husband to maintain an action to quiet his title to community property against the wife has been frequently upheld (Osborn v. Mills, supra; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 P. 308; Bollinger v. Wright, 143 Cal. 292, 76 P. 1108; Hammond v. McCollough, 159 Cal. 639, 115 P. 216), as the court said in Mitchell v. Moses, supra, the two cases last cited "* * * established the rule that the husband, or one claiming under him, may maintain an action to quiet title against the wife, or one claiming under her, where title to community property has been taken in her name."

The above authorities, we think, fully sustain plaintiff's right to maintain the present action.

The evidence sufficiently supports the findings, and no error is shown which would justify a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Test of whether defects in improvement proceedings are waived by failure to object before local legislative body is whether legislative body has power, in proceeding before it, to correct alleged defects (St. 1925, p. 864, § 10; p. 866, § 16; p. 905, § 52).

8. Municipal corporations 🔑488, 489(5).

Test of whether defects in improvement proceedings are waived by failure to object before local legislative body is whether or not alleged defective step could have been omitted altogether by state Legislature (St. 1925, p. 864, § 10; p. 866, § 16; p. 905, § 52).

9. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

Failure of state to consent to municipality constructing bridge over intrastate navigable water is jurisdictional defect not waived by failure to object before local legislative body (St. 1925, p. 864, § 10; p. 866, § 16; p. 905, § 52).

10. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

Erection of bridge over intrastate navigable water by municipality without state's consent would violate federal statute (33 USCA §§ 401, 406).

11. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

Contract entered into by municipality in violation of federal penal statute requiring state's consent to building bridge over intrastate navigable water would be void (33 USCA §§ 401, 406).

12. Bridges 🔑1.

General power to improve and construct highways gives municipalities power to construct bridges and causeways whenever local legislative body, in absence of fraud, deems such bridge or causeway reasonably necessary to construction and improvement of highway, regardless of whether bridge crosses navigable or nonnavigable waters (St. 1925, p. 902, § 50).

13. Appeal and error 🔑907(2).

Where evidence on which trial court's finding was based was not before reviewing court, finding must be presumed amply supported by record.

14. Municipal corporations 🔑63(1).

Finding of city council that bridge is necessary to construction or improvement of highway, in absence of fraud, is conclusive (St. 1925, p. 849).

15. Bridges 🔑4.

That five-sevenths of cost of highway improvement is to be expended on bridge does not necessarily determine that bridge is not "incidental to or reasonably connected with, construction and improvement of highway," within statute authorizing improvement of "highway" by municipality (St. 1925, p. 902, § 50).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Highway" and "Incidental," see Words and Phrases.]

16. Navigable waters 🔑20(1).

Where municipality is to build bridge across navigable waters, suitable protection must be given to rights of those engaged in navigation and commerce.

17. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

Where approval of appropriate federal officers to bridge improvement had been secured and appropriate state officers had approved width of spans necessary to permit free flow of water, rights of those engaged in navigation and commerce were protected.

18. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

General municipal statutory power to construct highways impliedly includes power to construct necessary bridges over navigable waters (St. 1925, p. 902, § 50; p. 905, § 52).

19. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

Statute authorizes municipalities to build bridges over navigable waters when reasonably necessary to construction and improvement of highway (St. 1883, p. 295).

20. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

"Navigable streams," as used in statute authorizing municipalities to build bridges, included all bodies of water (St. 1883, p. 295; Pol. Code, § 2875).

> St. 1883, p. 295, provides that it shall be lawful for municipal corporations to erect and maintain draw-bridges across "navigable streams" that flow through or penetrate the boundaries of such city, when the necessities require it. This statute refers to Pol. Code, § 2875, which contains the headnote, "How constructed over navigable waters," and which statute requires that bridges over navigable streams must have draws or swings of sufficient space to permit passage of various craft which may navigate "the stream or water bridged."

21. Statutes 🔑211.

Headnote of Code section may be considered part of Code for purposes of interpretation.

22. Navigable waters 🔑36(1, 3).

Lands underlying navigable waters and tidelands belong to state.

23. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

Before bridge can be constructed over lands underlying navigable waters and tidelands, an easement must be secured from state.

24. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

Statute held to grant municipality easement to construct bridge over lands underlying navigable waters and tidelands (St. 1865–66, p. 855).

> St. 1865–66, p. 855, is entitled "An act granting to roads and highways a right of way over the public lands of the state."

25. Navigable waters 🔑20(2).

Municipal corporations have express and implied authority to construct bridges and causeways over navigable intrastate waters whenever reasonably necessary in construction of highway improvement, provided approval of proper state and federal authorities be first secured (St. 1925, p. 902, § 50; p. 905, § 52; St. 1883, p. 295).

26. Statutes 🔑123(4).

Title of Acquisition and Improvement Act held not misleading for failure to contain term "bridges" or "causeways" (St. 1925, p. 849; Const. art. 4, § 24).

> While title of Acquisition and Improvement Act of St. 1925, p. 849, did not contain the term "bridges" or "causeways," title did contain a comprehensive description of the nature of the act in reference to the improvement of public highways and the word "highways" being broad enough to include the word "bridges."

27. Statutes 🔑109.

Title of act need not embrace entire catalogue or abstract of its contents (Const. art. 4, § 24).

28. Statutes 🔑109.

Title of act need merely indicate, or be logically germane to, subject and include subject within its scope (Const. art. 4, § 24).

29. Municipal corporations 🔑277.

Municipality has jurisdiction of highway public improvements whose termini are within municipality, although improvement crosses unincorporated territory (St. 1925, p. 852, § 2; p. 905, § 52).

30. Municipal corporations 🔑450(2).

Nonassessable land may be included within assessment district, without affecting validity of district.

31. Appeal and error 🔑671(3).

Where evidence attacking trial court's finding was not included in bill of exceptions, reviewing court could not consider validity of finding.

32. Municipal corporations 🔑488, 489(5).

Failure to object before common council that improvement district was neither contiguous nor continuous waived the point, it not being jurisdictional (St. 1925, p. 864, § 10; p. 866, § 16; p. 905, § 52).

33. Municipal corporations 🔑488, 489(5).

Failure to object before municipal council that county, which at no time objected to improvement, had not consented to permit bridge over nonassessable unincorporated territory of county waived defect (St. 1925, p. 852, § 2; p. 864, § 10; p. 866, § 16; p. 905, § 52).

34. Municipal corporations 🔑426.

Municipality is not liable for assessment on municipal lands not used in performance of public function, but lands themselves are primary debtor.

35. Municipal corporations 🔑426.

Municipal lands not being used in performance of public function may be sold to satisfy assessment.

36. Municipal corporations 🔑864(3).

Indebtedness of municipality in violation of constitutional and charter debt limitations cannot be created by assessment on municipal lands not used in performance of public function.

37. Municipal corporations 🔑231(2).

Superintendent of work for city for single public improvement, receiving no compensation therefor, held not "officer" or "employee" of city within charter prohibiting "officer" or "employee" of city from being interested in contract with city.

> Charter provision of city concerned prohibited any "officer" or "employee" of the city from being directly or indirectly interested in the performance of any work, contract or business with or for the city. Terms "officer" or "employee" as so used in the charter provision imply that person renders regular and continuous services, that the services are not limited to a particular transaction, that the person has a fixed tenure and is liable to account for misfeasance or nonfeasance, and that he receive compensation, though not all of such elements need concur.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Lloyd E. Griffin, Judge.

Action by the Southlands Company and others against the City of San Diego and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Harvey H. Atherton and H. C. Gardiner, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Earl H. Miller, Crouch & Sanders, and C. C. Pease, all of San Diego, for interveners and respondents.

M. W. Conkling, Crouch & Sanders, Charles C. Crouch, Hugh A. Sanders, and Ray M. Harris, all of San Diego, for respondents.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, and S. M. Haskins, all of Los Angeles (Edward E. Bacon, of Los Angeles, of counsel), amici curiæ for Municipal Bond Co.

PER CURIAM.

This is a proceeding brought by certain property owners within an assessment district to enjoin certain work authorized by the common council of the city of San Diego, purporting to act under the terms and provisions of the Acquisition and Improvement Act of 1925 (Cal. St. 1925, p. 849). It appears that the proposed improvement consists in part in the erection and building of a bridge and causeway across Mission Bay, a navigable body of water lying within the county of San Diego, belonging to the state of California, and over which the United States has retained sufficient jurisdiction to enable it to control navigation and commerce thereon. It further appears that the city of San Diego proceeded under the provisions of said act to create the necessary improvement and assessment district, heard protests of certain property owners whose properties were included therein, including the protest of appellants; and, after a hearing, overruled all such protests, and awarded the contract of construction to one of the defendants, Noble & Rhodes, Inc., who started and practically completed the work thereon.

Appellants sought in the trial court to have all of the proceedings taken by the common council declared null and void; to have all of the defendants enjoined from carrying on the work; to enjoin the city of San Diego from ordering or directing the issuance of any bonds; and to enjoin the further trial of certain condemnation actions brought by the city in an attempt to carry out the improvement.

After the filing of the complaint, defendants, respondents herein, generally and specially demurred. The trial court sustained a demurrer without leave to amend to part of the complaint and permitted amendments to other parts of the complaint. Plaintiffs thereupon filed certain amendments to the complaint, defendants answered, and the case was tried on its merits. After hearing the evidence and various arguments of counsel, the trial court dismissed plaintiffs' complaint and entered judgment for defendants. From the judgment so secured plaintiffs prosecute this appeal on a bill of exceptions.

So far as pertinent here, the trial court found that Mission Bay is a navigable body of water several square miles in area, located in San Diego county, belonging to the state of California, and over which the United States has jurisdiction to control navigation and commerce; that the common council of the city of San Diego had duly and regularly proceeded under the provisions of said Acquisition and Improvement Act to create the assessment district and had properly proceeded to take all necessary steps to carry out the improvement; that it is not true that the bridges and causeway to be erected as part of the improvement are not part of any street; that it is not true that the same are not the extension of a public highway; that it is true that no means of travel other than by water has ever existed along the line of the bridges and causeway; that it is true that according to the estimate of the engineer of work, at least five-sevenths of the total cost of the entire improvement will be expended in the erection and construction of the bridges and causeway; that the total cost of said improvement will be approximately $725,000; that defendants have the "right, power, and authority to build said causeway and bridges over said Mission Bay, and that the said bridges and causeway will, when constructed, constitute a part of an extension of a public street and highway"; that Mission Bay is not within the boundaries of the city of San Diego; that the consent of the county of San Diego has not been secured to the erection and construction of the improvement over county property; that only property within the city of San Diego is to be assessed for the improvement; that the said causeway and bridges "are necessary and proper to complete, connect with, and render of greater use to the public existing improvements in and on public ways * * * and that the consent, easement, and rights of way of the state of California, and of the United States government have been obtained for the construction of said improvements"; that the plans and specifications require that as part of said improvement a causeway 950 feet long on one side of the bay and 2,300 feet on the other, and two bridges 950 feet and 750 feet long, respectively, be erected; that the assessment district is divided into twelve zones; that zones 9 and 10 are on the south side of Mission Bay; that the waters of Mission Bay lie between these two zones and the ten zones on the north side of the bay; that the waters of the bay are included within the exterior boundaries of the district; that no part of the waters of the bay, or the lands underlying the same, have been or could be assessed for the improvement; and that the entire improvement is to be constructed within the boundaries of the assessment district.

On this appeal appellants contend that the entire proceedings are null and void, and that if the work be continued and the assessment levied, appellants will be deprived of their property without due process of law. Appellants' objections in this regard can be conveniently grouped under four main heads:

1. That neither said act nor any other statute confers on cities the power to construct bridges and causeways over navigable waters of the state; that under the federal law the consent of the state must be secured to the construction of such bridges and causeways; that such consent has not been granted; that if said act does authorize the construction of bridges over navigable waters, it is unconstitutional for the reason that it then embraces more than one subject not expressed in its title.

2. That the major portion of the improvement is outside the assessment district; that the district is not continuous nor contiguous; that even if said act does authorize the construction of bridges, it does not authorize the construction of an improvement partially in the municipality and partially in unincorporated territory; that the county of San Diego has never consented to the improvement crossing unincorporated territory.

3. That within the assessment district are included municipally owned lands not devoted to a public purpose; that the liability of the city for such assessments constitutes an indebtedness in excess of the constitutional and charter provisions of the city of San Diego.

4. That one Paul R. Watson has been appointed "Engineer of Work," and "Superintendent of Work"; that the position of "Superintendent of Work" is a public office; that the employment of the same person in both positions constitutes a violation of certain provisions of the city charter.

[1] The trial court specifically found that the first three objections set forth above were not made before the city council in the formal protest filed by appellants. As to whether the fourth objection was or was not made does not directly appear; that point having been determined on demurrer; and the bill of exceptions containing no reference thereto. It must be assumed, therefore, that the objection was not made, all presumptions being in favor of the trial court's judgment. These objections will be considered in order.

[2] The most important question presented on this appeal is whether the Acquisition and Improvement Act of 1925, or any other statute, confers authority upon municipalities to build bridges over navigable intrastate water, when such a bridge becomes reasonably necessary in the construction and improvement of a highway. Inasmuch as the United States possesses jurisdiction over such waters for the purpose of controlling navigation and commerce, it is obvious that the consent of the United States authorities must be secured for the construction of such a bridge. In this regard, an act of Congress of March 3, 1899, provides in part (U. S. C. A. title 33, § 401, p. 377):

"It shall not be lawful to construct or commence the construction of any bridge, dam, dyke, or causeway over or in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, navigable river, or other navigable water of the United States until the consent of Congress to the building of such structures shall have been obtained and until the plans for the same shall have been submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War: Provided, That such structures may be built under authority of the legislature of a State across rivers and other waterways the navigable portions of which lie wholly within the limits of a single State, provided the location and plans thereof are submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War before construction is commenced. * * *"

It is likewise provided that any person or corporation violating the above section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. U. S. C. A., title 33, § 406, p. 425.

[3] Under the above statutory provision, it is clear that the source of the authority to build a bridge over intrastate navigable waters is the state, and not the United States. In other words, no approval other than that of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers to the location and plans of the bridge need be secured from the United States. Such approval was admittedly secured in the present case. However, it is obvious under the terms of the above statute that such approval of the United States authorities confers no right on the applicant in the absence of the consent of the state. The approval of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers is necessarily predicated on the assumption that the consent of the state has or will be given. This is just another way of stating that the source of authority to build such a bridge lies in the state and not in the United States. See International Bridge Co. v. New York, 254 U. S. 126, 132, 41 S. Ct. 56, 65 L. Ed. 176.

Therefore, since the consent of the properly authorized United States authorities has been secured to build the bridges and causeway involved herein, the only question to be determined on this appeal in this regard is whether the state Legislature has authorized and consented to the construction of such bridges and causeway.

[4] There can be no question but that the state Legislature by a general statute may delegate to any agency such as a municipality the power to consent and order the construction of such a bridge. Wright v. Nagle, 101 U. S. 791, 25 L. Ed. 921. Respondents contend that our statute has conferred upon municipalities the right and power to construct bridges over navigable intrastate waters when such bridges are an integral part of a highway improvement. Appellants contend that neither that statute nor any other statute has conferred such a power on municipalities.

At the outset of this discussion, respondents point out that the proceedings involved herein were taken under the provisions of the Acquisition and Improvement Act, and also point out that the objection that the state has not consented to the construction of such a bridge, was not made before the common council of the city of San Diego as one of the grounds of protest of such improvement. Respondents contend that under the curative provisions of that act, appellants are precluded from now objecting to the proceedings on this or any other ground not specified as a ground of objection before the common council. The curative provision most strongly relied on is found in section 16 of the act which provides in part:

"All objections to any acts or proceedings relating to the improvement prior to the time within which such objections are permitted by this section to be filed, not made in writing and in the manner and at the time aforesaid, shall be waived. It is the intent of this section that any person failing to file such notice within the time specified shall be deemed to have intentionally waived every objection to the regularity or validity of such acts or proceedings and he shall be estopped from thereafter raising the same."

In addition, section 10 of the act provides in part:

"The findings and determination of said legislative body upon the matters of the extent and boundaries of the assessment district, the zones, if any, into which said district is divided, the percentage of the expenses to be raised from each of said zones, the grades to which the improvement is to be constructed, and the necessity for the acquisition, or improvement, or both, comprehended by the proceeding, shall be final and conclusive."

And section 52 provides in part:

"No error, defect, irregularity, informality and no neglect or omission of any officer of any county or municipality, in any procedure taken hereunder, which does not affect the jurisdiction of the legislative body to order the doing of the thing or things proposed to be done, shall avoid or invalidate such proceeding or any bonds issued thereunder.

The exclusive remedy of any person affected or aggrieved thereby shall be by appeal to the legislative body as hereinbefore provided."

[5, 6] Curative and conclusive evidence provisions similar to those quoted above, found in other street improvement and bond acts, have been the fertile source of litigation. It is now well settled, if such provisions are found in the statute, that, if a property owner fails to file a protest with the municipal legislative body, or protests on certain designated grounds and such protest has been denied, he cannot later, in a proceeding in court or elsewhere, complain of the denial of his protest on grounds other than those stated in his protest, nor can he on any grounds not stated in any protest maintain an action to restrain any improvement authorized by the municipal legislative body. In other words, objections to proceedings for public improvements are waived if not seasonably and properly urged before the local legislative body. See, for several recent cases discussing the rule, Blake v. City of Eureka, 201 Cal. 643, 258 P. 945; Noyes v. DeGolyer, 202 Cal. 542, 261 P. 1006. It is equally well settled, however, that objections addressed to the proceeding, constituting, or necessary to constitute, a compliance with the "due process" clause of the state and federal Constitutions are not waived by failure to urge the same before the legislative branch of the municipality wherein the improvement proceedings were had. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 P. 81; Watkinson v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 55, 186 P. 753; Noyes v. DeGolyer, supra. The difficulty comes in such cases in determining just what constitutes a defect going to "due process," or what has been termed in some cases as a "jurisdictional defect." The leading case discussing what defects are and what defects are not waived by failure to object is Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 P. 81, in interpreting similar provisions found in the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147). In that case, the court, after discussing what defects are waived, stated at page 360 of 146 Cal., 80 P. 81, 85:

"What, then, are the essentials, the nonobservance of which cannot be cured? The property must be within the jurisdiction of the local board; there must be the actual performance of some work which is to be paid for (that is, a subject-matter of which the council can acquire jurisdiction); an assessment or apportionment of the amount to be raised must be made; and, as above stated, there must be sufficient notice and opportunity for the hearing and determination of grievances and objections to constitute due process of law."

Section 52 of the Mattoon Act, itself, quoted supra, recognizes the distinction, wherein it is provided that "no error * * * in any procedure taken hereunder, which does not affect the jurisdiction of the legislative body * * * shall avoid * * * such proceeding. * * *" See, also, Chapman v. Jocelyn, 182 Cal. 294, 300, 187 P. 962; Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 P. 920; People v. Van Nuys Lighting District, 173 Cal. 792, 797, 162 P. 97, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 255.

[7, 8] It seems clear, under the above decisions, that the main purpose of requiring all objections to be specified before the municipal legislative body is not, primarily, to lay the foundation of a future suit, but to give opportunity to the local legislative body to correct any errors, defects, or irregularities in the proceedings. Obviously, if the defect is of such a nature that the legislative body before whom the objections have been filed has no power to correct it, the making of an objection would not fulfill the above purpose. One test of whether the defect is waived by failure to object, suggested by the above decisions, is whether the legislative body has power in the proceeding before it to correct the defect alleged to exist. Another test is whether or not the particular step alleged to be faulty, irregular, or defective, could have been omitted altogether by the Legislature of the state in prescribing the procedure to be followed in creating the district and levying the assessment.

[9] We have no hesitancy in holding that if the defect now urged by appellants does exist—that is, if the state has not consented to the construction of bridges by municipalities over intrastate navigable waters, when such a bridge is reasonably necessary in the construction of a highway—then that defect is jurisdictional in the sense that it is not waived by failure to object on that ground before the local legislative body. Under either of the tests suggested above, the defect is not waived by failure to object.

[10, 11] Moreover, erection of the bridge without state consent would constitute a direct evasion of the federal statute above quoted, violation of which is made a crime. Under elementary principles, any contract entered into by the city in violation of such a penal statute renders the contract void. See Berka v. Woodward, 125 Cal. 119, 126, 57 P. 777, 45 L. R. A. 420, 73 Am. St. Rep. 31; Stockton Plumbing & Supply Co. v. Wheeler, 68 Cal. App. 592, 601, 229 P. 1020.

[12] We now turn to a discussion of whether or not the state has conferred upon municipalities the authority to build bridges over navigable intrastate waters. Appellants contend that the act in question limits the authority of a municipality to the construction and improvement of highways in the sense of roadways, and strenuously contend that the construction and erection of a bridge over navigable waters does not constitute the improvement of a highway within the meaning of the act.

The act specifically authorizes the construction of bridges, at least under certain circumstances. Section 50 provides in part:

"The word 'improve,' and any of its variants, as used in this act, shall be deemed to mean and shall include the construction or doing of the things and work following, either singly or in any combination thereof, as well as the reconstruction and repairing thereof; * * * the construction or reconstruction of sidewalks, crosswalks, steps, parks and parkways, culverts, bridges, curbs, gutters, tunnels, subways, or viaducts; * * * all other work which may be deemed necessary to improve the whole or any portion of any public ways or property or rights of way of the public; all other work or improvements auxiliary, incidental, necessary or convenient to any of the above, which may be required to carry out, facilitate or complete the same."

Appellants admit that there can be no question but that the above section authorizes a municipality to construct a bridge merely incidental to the construction or improvement of a highway, but contend that the bridge herein involved is not merely incidental to the construction or improvement of a highway, emphasizing in this regard that the trial court found that five-sevenths of the total cost of the improvement is to be expended on the bridges and causeway, and also emphasizing the fact that the bridges and causeway are to cross navigable waters. It was specifically held by this court in the case of Bailey v. City of Hermosa Beach, 183 Cal. 757, 761, 192 P. 712, 713, under the provisions of the Vrooman Act similar to the above, that "the act * * * authorizes the construction of bridges in the street of a city without any limitation other than the general implied one that the bridges be for street purposes." Appellants contend, however, that the word "bridges" as above used is to be strictly limited to "incidental bridges" in the nature of viaducts, etc., and is not to be extended to include bridges over navigable waters. From a reading of the entire act, we are of the opinion that, even if the word "bridges" was not contained in section 50 of the act, the general power to improve and construct highways, would include the power to construct bridges and causeways whenever in the opinion of the local legislative body, and in the absence of fraud, a bridge and causeway becomes reasonably necessary in the construction and improvement of a highway, and this without regard whether the bridge crosses navigable or nonnavigable waters. In this connection, the trial court found that:

"* * * The said bridges and causeway will, when constructed, constitute a part of, and an extension of, a public street and highway, to-wit: Ingraham street from Crown Point across the waters of Mission Bay to connect with a proposed street, as established in these proceedings, denominated Ingraham street, ending with Point Loma Boulevard, and leading to said water from the main portion of the city of San Diego."

And the court further found:

"* * * That the said causeway and bridges are necessary and proper to complete, connect with, and render of greater use to the public existing improvements in and on public ways within said municipality."

[13] The evidence upon which this finding is based is not before us on this appeal, and must, therefore, be presumed to be amply supported by the record.

[14, 15] The resolution of intention of the common council of the city of San Diego provided in part, "That the public interest, convenience, and necessity require * * * that a public right of way for street purposes be acquired * * * and it is hereby determined that said right of way, through, over and upon the said lands is necessary to be taken and acquired for the said purpose. * * *"

It appears to us clear that under the general power to construct and improve highways conferred upon municipalities by the provisions of the statute a municipality has the power to construct a bridge over navigable or nonnavigable waters, whenever in the opinion of the local legislative body it becomes reasonably necessary in such construction or improvement to construct such a bridge, and, in the absence of fraud, the finding of that body that such a bridge is necessary, is conclusive and not subject to review. We do not see how the mere fact that five-sevenths of the cost of the improvement is to be expended on the construction of the bridge, determines that, as a matter of fact, such bridge is not incidental to, or reasonably connected with, the construction and improvement of a highway.

[16, 17] Where the bridge is to cross navigable waters suitable protection must be given to the right of those engaged in navigation and commerce. In the case at bar, not only has the approval of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers been secured, but also the Director of Public Works and State Engineer of California have approved the "width of the spans necessary to permit the free flow of water." Thus the rights of those engaged in navigation and commerce have been protected.

We have been unable to discover any prior decision of this court, holding that the power to construct highways includes the power where reasonably necessary, to construct bridges over navigable waters, the question apparently never having been presented. Other states, however, have held that such power exists. One of the early and leading cases on the subject, where the problem is fully discussed, is Brown v. Town of Preston, 38 Conn. 219. In that case, at page 223, the court stated:

"The statute in general terms confers on the Superior Court the power to lay out highways in certain cases, and prescribes the manner in which it shall be done. Stat., p. 498, sec. 29. The statute however is silent in respect to bridges. That the power to lay out a highway carries with it the power to require the construction of bridges in the line of the highway, over all streams and rivers not navigable, cannot be denied. It must also be conceded that inlets and rivers navigable to some extent are within the limits of this power. That such has been the practical construction of the statute the records of our courts and reported cases will abundantly show. Wethersfield and Glastonbury v. Humphrey, 20 Conn. 218; Clark v. Saybrook, 21 Conn. 313; Groton and Ledyard v. Hurlburt, 22 Conn. 178.

"But we are urged to limit this power to those cases in which the navigation is so inconsiderable as not to require the construction of a draw-bridge. We have not discovered any good reason for such a limitation. It would prove detrimental to the interests of the public along our navigable rivers and seacoast, by checking improvements in the matter of highways, while, on the other hand, the advantages sought to be secured thereby are unimportant and inconsiderable. * * *

"It is apparent that if the bridge is constructed with a suitable draw, the injury to navigation will be very slight. Whatever the inconvenience may be, it was doubtless fully considered by the committee in determining the common convenience and necessity of the proposed highway. It was proper that it should be so considered. Upon such consideration it is found that the public wants require the construction of the highway, including the bridge. The slight inconvenience to which those interested in the navigation of this cove will be subjected, should be endured for the sake of the greater good accruing to the public at large.

"The most serious objection to construing this statute as conferring the powers contended for, is found in the fact that the statute makes no provision for the construction of a draw-bridge. Although the statute contains no express authority, yet we think it may be clearly implied in cases where public convenience and necessity demand a highway across a navigable stream of water. Towns in the construction of highways exercise the right of eminent domain, which right is delegated by them by the legislature. The obstruction of navigation by means of a drawbridge is an exercise of this same right. The power implied therefore is of the same general nature, and is necessary in order to secure fully the main object contemplated by the statute."

The above case was affirmed in the case of Bryan v. Town of Branford, 50 Conn. 246, 250. See, also, Aransas County v. Coleman-Fulton Pasture Co., 108 Tex. 216, 191 S. W. 553, where many of the decisions on the subject are reviewed.

[18] We are therefore of the opinion that the general power to construct highways conferred on municipalities by the statute includes by necessary implication the power and authority to construct a bridge over navigable waters whenever the construction of such a bridge becomes reasonably necessary in the construction of a highway, and is an integral part thereof. We think this interpretation of the act is in accord with the intent of the legislature as indicated by section 52 of the act, which provides in part: "This act and all of its provisions shall be liberally construed to the end that the purposes hereof may be effected."

[19] We are not presented with the question and, therefore, we do not determine whether an assessment district could be created solely for the purpose of constructing a bridge not connected with a highway improvement. That is not the situation presented herein, as shown by the findings above quoted. Even if the statute did not impliedly authorize municipalities to build bridges over navigable waters, when reasonably necessary in the construction and improvement of a highway, direct statutory authority exists for the construction of such a bridge. By a statute of 1883 (Cal. St. 1883, p. 295) it is provided in part:

"It shall be lawful for municipal corporations, and they are hereby authorized by their respective legislative body or bodies, to erect and maintain drawbridges across navigable streams that flow through or penetrate the boundaries of such cities, when the necessities require it. Such bridges shall in all respects be constructed in accordance with the provisions of section two thousand eight hundred seventy-five of the Political Code."

[20] It is, of course, true that the above statute uses the expression "navigable streams," but we have no hesitancy in holding that "streams," as therein used, comprehend such a body of water as Mission Bay. There is nothing to indicate that "streams," as therein used, was not used in its most comprehensive sense, including all bodies of water. This interpretation is indicated by the fact that the above statute directly refers to section 2875 of the Political Code. That section provides:

"All bridges constructed under this chapter crossing navigable streams must be so constructed as not to obstruct navigation, and must have a draw or swing of sufficient space or span to permit the safe, convenient, and expeditious passage at all times of any steamer, vessel, or raft which may navigate the stream or water bridged."

[21] It is to be noted that in the last part of the Political Code section above quoted the expression used is "stream or water," which expression was obviously and clearly intended as the equivalent of the expression "navigable streams," as used in the first part of the section. Moreover, the headnote of section 2875 of the Political Code, as it appears in the code commissioner's edition, reads: "How constructed over navigable waters." Such headnote may be considered part of the Code itself, for purposes of interpretation. 23 Cal. Jur. 772, § 147.

Appellant has cited three cases from other states. (Murdock v. Stickney, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 113; Jones v. State, 114 Ga. 538, 40 S. E. 807; School Trustees v. Schroll, 120 Ill. 509, 12 N. E. 243, 60 Am. Rep. 575), all of which hold that the expression "streams," as used in certain statutes involved therein, must be limited to bodies of water having a definite and continuous current. Respondents and amicus curiæ have referred us to two cases (Munson v. Hungerford, 6 Barb. [N. Y.] 265, and Long v. Boone County, 36 Iowa, 60), holding that the word "streams," as used in certain statutes there under consideration, was used in its most comprehensive sense to include all bodies of water. Either interpretation of the word as used in the statute of 1883 is therefore permissible, and from the analysis already given, we are of the opinion that the term was therein used in its most comprehensive sense, including within its scope waters such as those herein involved.

[22-24] In this state lands underlying navigable waters and tidelands belong to the state, and before a bridge can be constructed over such lands an easement must be secured from the state. Having already held that a bridge is included within the power to construct highways, there can be no doubt that such an easement has been granted in the present case. By an act of April 2, 1866 (Cal. St. 1865–66, p. 855), an easement for such highways has been granted in the most comprehensive terms. The title to that act reads: "An act granting to roads and highways a right of way over the public lands of the state."

[25] We conclude this part of the discussion with the observation that the city of San Diego and other municipal corporations have both express and implied power and authority to construct bridges and causeways over the navigable intrastate waters of the state, whenever such bridge or causeway becomes reasonably necessary in the construction of a highway improvement, provided the approval of the proper state and federal authorities be first secured to insure that the proposed structure will not unduly interfere with navigation and commerce.

[26-28] Appellants next contend that if the Acquisition and Improvement Act does authorize the construction of bridges over navigable waters, then it is unconstitutional, being in violation of article 4, section 24, of the California Constitution, providing that every act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title. It is true that the title of the act does not contain the terms "bridges" or "causeways," but the title does contain a comprehensive description of the nature of the act in reference to the "acquisition of, including the laying out, opening, extending, widening, straightening, and acquiring in any manner, in whole or in part, and for the improvement of and work upon public highways, roads, streets, avenues, boulevards, lanes, alleys, courts, places, parks, pleasure grounds, commons, and all public ways and other property and rights of way of the public." It is clear, inasmuch as we have already held that the word "highways" impliedly includes "bridges," that in no sense can the title of the act be said to be misleading. It must be noted that the title of an act need not embrace an entire catalogue or abstract of its contents. All that is required is that the subject must be indicated by the title of the act, or be logically germane to it, and included within its scope. See Park v. Pacific Fire Extinguisher Co., 37 Cal. App. 112, 173 P. 615; Buelke v. Levenstadt, 190 Cal. 684, 214 P. 42; McClure v. Riley, 198 Cal. 23, 243 P. 429; 23 Cal. Jur., pp. 646 et seq. The point is without merit.

[29] The next contentions of appellants are built around the findings of the trial court that Mission Bay, over which the bridges and causeway are to be constructed, is not within the boundaries of the city of San Diego, but is within the unincorporated territory of the county of San Diego. Other than the bridges and causeway, however, the rest of the improvement is within the city of San Diego, the termini of the improvement being so located, and being bisected by the bridges and causeways. Appellants contend that even if the statute confers power and authority upon municipalities to build the bridges and causeways here provided for, the act specifically limits the jurisdiction of municipal corporations so as to exclude power and authority to construct the improvement over unincorporated territory under the circumstances here existing. This contention is based on a literal reading of section 2 of the act, which provides in part: "Likewise, the jurisdiction of the legislative body of a municipality shall be extended over and it shall have said power and authority to acquire and improve public ways within the boundaries of such municipality, and also those forming its exterior boundaries where it joins unincorporated territory of the county or the territory of another municipality, and also public ways and public property lying within unincorporated territory of a county and of one or more other municipalities * * * provided, that the consent of the legislative body or bodies of the county and of such other municipality or municipalities within the boundaries of which such public ways and property lie, expressed by resolution, shall first be obtained thereto and to the assessment of the property therein. * * * "

It will be noted that the above section provides expressly for three classes of improvements over which a municipality has jurisdiction, viz: (1) Improvements entirely within the boundaries of the municipality. (2) Improvements forming the exterior boundaries of the municipality, where it joins unincorporated territory of the county or of another municipality. (It should be here noted that the trial court expressly found that the proposed improvement did not fall within either of these two classes.) (3) Improvements lying partly within the municipality and partly "lying within unincorporated territory of a county and of one or more other municipalities."

Appellants construe the last-quoted provision of the statute to mean that when a municipality desires to construct an improvement partially within its boundaries and partially across unincorporated territory, the municipality has jurisdiction over the entire improvement only when the proposed improvement has one terminus in the municipality instituting the proceeding and the other terminus in another municipality, but so to join the two municipalities, the improvement must cross unincorporated territory. Such a situation is undoubtedly provided for by the section, the act providing that the municipality first instituting proceedings shall have jurisdiction over the entire improvement, providing the consent of the county and the other municipality be first secured to the improvement and to the assessment. Appellants point out that the improvement here involved does not run between two different municipalities, but between parts of the same municipality; that, to do so, it must cross unincorporated territory; and that admittedly the consent of the county of San Diego was not secured so to do. If the act does not confer jurisdiction on a municipality to construct such an improvement, we are of the opinion that clearly this point was not waived by failure to protest on that ground before the common council, under the authorities above cited, the alleged defect being jurisdictional in the sense that it goes to due process.

The question as to whether a municipality has jurisdiction over an improvement partially within its boundaries and partially lying within and across unincorporated territory seems never to have been raised in this state. It was not noticed in the initial case upholding the act, for in that case, Los Angeles v. Hunt, 198 Cal. 753, at page 756, 247 P. 897, it was said: "An examination of the aforesaid act of 1925 discloses that the controlling purpose of those who framed it and of the Legislature in its adoption was to provide a simplified plan, and at the same time a comprehensive procedure for the acquisition and improvement of public ways, parks, and pleasure grounds, whether lying entirely within unincorporated territory of a county or within the territory of a municipality, or lying partly within such unincorporated territory and partly within one or more municipalities, or lying within two or more municipalities, or forming the exterior boundary of any municipality where the same joins unincorporated territory of a county or the territory of another municipality whether partly within or without such boundary."

The title of the act contains language almost identical with that quoted from the Hunt Case. Evidently in framing the body of the act the Legislature did not expressly provide for the situation involved where the improvement is partially in the municipality and partially in unincorporated territory. This point we do not deem it necessary to decide, the issue not being involved on this appeal. It is clear that the Legislature has provided for jurisdiction in the municipality when the termini of the improvement are in different municipalities, and the improvement crosses unincorporated territory. In the absence of an expressed or implied limitation to the contrary, this grant of jurisdiction, by necessary inference, must be interpreted to include jurisdiction over all similar improvements of a lesser degree, which would include an improvement where the termini of the improvement are in the same municipality and the improvement crosses unincorporated territory. This interpretation we think is justified under section 52 of the act, supra, which provides in part that "this act and all of its provisions shall be liberally construed to the end that the purposes hereof may be effective."

[30] The unincorporated territory herein included, consists entirely of the lands and waters of Mission bay. This territory is included within the exterior boundaries of the assessment district, but the lands therein included, it is admitted and the trial court found, are not subjected to any assessment. Appellants' contentions that the district is neither contiguous nor continuous because bisected by this unincorporated nonassessable land are obviously erroneous. It is too well settled to require citation of authority that nonassessable land may be included within an assessment district, without affecting the validity of the district.

[31, 32] Moreover, the trial court expressly found that "it is not true that the lands contained in such district are not contiguous." This finding has not been attacked by the appellants, and the evidence to support the same has not been included in the bill of exceptions and cannot, therefore, be considered by this court. Furthermore, this point was waived by failure to object on that ground before the common council, it not being jurisdictional. Teeter v. Los Angeles (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 11.

[33] It is admitted that the consent of the board of supervisors of the county of San Diego has never been secured to cross the unincorporated territory of the county, and for that reason the appellants contend that the proceedings are void. Such consent is provided for in section 2 of the act above quoted. But we are not here dealing with a situation where county land is included in an assessment district, and subjected to assessment. The entire land included within the district and crossed by the improvement is free from assessment, being lands owned by the sovereign. Under such circumstances, the consent of the county for permission to cross Mission bay would be merely a formal consent, and we are of the opinion that such defect does not go to due process, and was, therefore, waived by failure to object on that ground before the common council. It should be noted that the county has at no time objected to the improvement on this or any other ground.

[34-36] Appellants next object to the improvement on the ground that the city of San Diego owns a large acreage within the assessment district, consisting of pueblo lands not used in the performance of a public function, and which lands are subjected to the assessment. It is contended that such liability creates an indebtedness of the city in violation of the debt limitations found in the Constitution and city charter. The conclusive answer to this contention is found in the fact that the lands of the city so subject to assessment are admittedly not lands used in the performance of a public function. The lands themselves, therefore, are the primary debtor and not the city. In the case of Pasadena v. McAllaster, 204 Cal. 267, 267 P. 873, chiefly relied on by the appellants, the lands involved were public lands used in the performance of a public function, and, therefore, the lands themselves could not be sold to satisfy the assessment, the city, under the terms of the act, being personally liable for the assessment. Here, however, the lands are not being used in the performance of a public function, and they may, therefore, be sold to satisfy the assessment. Under such circumstances, the liability is primarily that of the lands and not of the city, and, obviously, the debt limitations of the state Constitution and the city charter are not applicable.

[37] The last objection to the proceeding, of which some mention should be made, is that the same person was employed as engineer of work and as superintendent of work. It is contended that this violates a charter provision prohibiting any officer or employee of the city from being directly or indirectly interested in the performance of any work, contract or business with or for the city. It appears that one Paul R. Watson has been appointed superintendent of the work for the city, with no compensation, and that the same person is likewise engineer of work, his compensation for this service to be three per cent. of the contract price. The trial court sustained a demurrer without leave to amend to this allegation of the complaint, and was undoubtedly correct in so doing. Primarily, it was correct, because we are of the opinion that Watson, as superintendent of work for this one improvement, was not an "officer or employee" of the city, as used in the charter provision under discussion. Under similar provisions, it has uniformly been held that the terms "officers and employees," as so used, imply that the person render regular and continuous services; that the services are not limited to a particular transaction; that the person has a fixed tenure or position; that the person is liable to account for misfeasance or nonfeasance; and that he receive compensation. It is true that all these elements need not concur, but in reference to Watson not one of them is present. Under such circumstances he cannot be held to be an officer or employee within the prohibition found in the charter. See Louisville R. R. Co. v. Wilson, 138 U. S. 501, 505, 11 S. Ct. 405, 34 L. Ed. 1023; Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 P. 120; Kennedy v. City of Gustine, 199 Cal. 251, 248 P. 910; Reid v. Boyle, 43 Cal. App. 34, 184 P. 423.

[38] In the second place, the trial court was undoubtedly correct in sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend to this allegation of the complaint, because it does not appear that this objection was made before the common council, and, therefore, under section 16 of the act and the authorities already cited, it must be conclusively deemed to have been waived.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from should be and it is hereby affirmed.

SHAW v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.

L. A. 12551.

Supreme Court of California.
March 26, 1931.

1. Attorney and client 🔑53(1).

That person employing attorney to prosecute personal injury action was licensed adjuster was immaterial as respected attorney's liability to suspension (Pol. Code, § 633e).

2. Attorney and client 🔑38.

"Unlicensed person," as used in rules for professional conduct for members of Bar, refers to persons unlicensed to practice law.

> Rules of professional conduct adopted by the State Bar and approved by Supreme Court provide, among other things, that a member of the State Bar should not employ another to solicit, or obtain, or remunerate another for soliciting or obtaining professional employment for him; nor shall he directly or indirectly share with unlicensed person compensation arising out of, or incidental to, professional employment; nor shall he directly or indirectly aid or abet unlicensed person to practice law or to receive compensation therefrom nor knowingly accept professional employment on behalf of claimant in personal injury or death case offered to him as result of, or incident to, activities of unlicensed person controlling, directing, or influencing such employment, for compensation.

Attorney accepting employment in personal injury action from insurance adjuster soliciting case held properly suspended for one year.

In Bank.

Application by D. L. Shaw for review of proceedings had against him before the Board of Governors of the State Bar and recommendation made by that body that petitioner be suspended from practice of law for the period of one year.

Petitioner suspended.

Wilbert C. Hamilton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, of Los Angeles (Timon E. Owens, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The petitioner applies to this court for a review of the proceedings had against him before the Board of Governors of the State Bar and of the recommendation made by that body that the petitioner be suspended from the practice of the law for the period of one year. There were two accusations presented by the Los Angeles Bar Association against the petitioner before the local administrative committee of the Board of Bar Governors of the State Bar in the county of Los Angeles. In each of these the accused was charged with the violation of rule 3 of the rules of professional conduct adopted by the State Bar of California and approved by this court on May 24, 1928, which rule reads as follows: "A member of The State Bar shall not employ another to solicit or obtain, or remunerate another for soliciting or obtaining, professional employment for him; nor shall he directly or indirectly share with an unlicensed person compensation arising out of or incidental to professional employment; nor shall be directly or indirectly aid or abet an unlicensed person to practice law or to receive compensation therefrom; nor shall he knowingly accept professional employment on behalf of a claimant in a personal injury or death case offered to him as a result of or as an incident to the activities of an unlicensed person who for compensation controls, directs or influences such employment."

The particular facts relied upon as constituting a violation of the aforesaid rule in respect to the first of these accusations were these: In the month of August, 1928, an automobile accident occurred in said county, in which three persons, viz., Marie Rasmussen, Ruth Rasmussen, and Charles Aney were injured. Very shortly after the occurrence of such injury one Ben S. Levy, then doing business as "Golden State Adjustment Organization," solicited from these injured persons employment as their and each of their agent and representative to adjust, settle, or litigate their claims for damages as a result of their injuries, and procured from them and each of them an agreement in writing authorizing him to represent them fully in the matter of the adjustment and settlement of their aforesaid claims and in the course thereof, if necessary, to employ an attorney or attorneys to represent them in the course of such litigation as might ensue, and for which service, including counsel fees, the said Levy was to receive 50 per cent. of whatever sums were secured or recovered, in the course of such adjustment or litigation. An action in each of these cases being found necessary or advisable, the original complaints therein were prepared by one Fainer at the instance and under the direction of Levy, but shortly after said actions were commenced the petitioner herein was, at the instance of Levy, substituted as the attorney of record in the place and stead of Fainer. The cases were subsequently settled and dismissed at the instance of the petitioner, and from the sum or sums received in the course of such settlement the petitioner retained the sum of 50 per cent. which, lessened by the amount of his agreed fees, he paid over to Levy. The petitioner prior to and in the course of his employment as the attorney of record in said cases had no connection with and did not come in contact with the parties plaintiff in either of said actions up to the time of the settlement and adjustment thereof, his entire activities and conduct of said litigation being carried on through and by virtue of his relationship with Levy.

In the second of said accusations substantially the same facts and conditions were alleged and found to exist with relation to the employment and conduct of the cases referred to therein, with the exception of the fact that the adjuster in the solicitation of the cases referred to in said accusation was one Gusseroff, who was at the time operating under the name of "Royal Adjustment Company." In the settlement of these cases also the accused received and distributed whatever sums of money were paid in compromise of said claims, receiving as his fee the agreed portion of the 50 per cent. to be retained by Gusseroff as his share of the recovery under his agreement with the injured parties.

The evidence taken before the administrative committee supported the foregoing statement of facts and showed that the accused in accepting employment in the cases referred to in these two accusations was fully advised of the fact that each of said so-called adjusters was engaged in the business of soliciting claims of this character, or, to use a modern phrase, was regularly engaged in the business of ambulance chasing under the cloak of their respective fictitious titles and names. The evidence educed before the committee further sufficiently showed that the controlling factor in the procurement of the claims referred to in each accusation and in the employment of the accused, and in the conduct and disposition of said causes, both before and after the complaint filed respectively therein, was none other than the solicitor and adjuster, by whom the accused was employed and through whom he was paid, and who in each instance was a person who was unlicensed to practice law.

[1, 2] The first contention which the petitioner urges in justification of his employment and conduct in the causes referred to in each of said accusations is that in each instance the person by whom he was employed was a licensed adjuster under the provisions of section 633e of the Political Code (St. 1925, p. 421, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1045); and that this being so the provision of rule 3 of the rules for professional conduct of the State Bar, which prohibits a member of the State Bar from sharing with an "unlicensed person" compensation arising out of or incidental to professional employment, and which forbids an attorney from aiding or abetting such "unlicensed person" to practice law or to receive compensation therefrom, and which makes it unethical and a violation of such rule to accept professional employment on behalf of a claimant in a personal injury or death case offered to him as a result of or as an incident to the activities of an "unlicensed person who for compensation controls, directs or influences such employment," has no application to his case or to his conduct in respect to which said two accusations were presented. We find no merit in this contention. The phrase "unlicensed person" in the several connections in which the same is used in rule 3 obviously refers to a person unlicensed to practice law and has no reference whatever to that class of persons, not being admitted to practice law, who may obtain permits to do the business referred to in section 633e of the Political Code. It is immaterial, therefore, to this proceeding whether or not the two individuals, neither of whom was a licensed attorney, were licensed adjusters. The law, so far as framed, has not attempted to interfere with or to regulate the activities and engagements of persons who have not been admitted to practice law in their effort to negotiate agreements between themselves and others injured in accidents or casualties of various sorts, whereby they shall be authorized to adjust claims or make settlements for the damages caused by such injuries, provided that in so doing, or in acting under such agreement, if made, such unlicensed persons do not engage in the practice of the law; but the law does undertake to define and limit the right which those who have been admitted to practice law, and as such have become attorneys and counselors at law and by virtue thereof have become active members of the organization known as the State Bar of California, to enter into those certain engagements with such unlicensed persons and particularly with reference to personal injury cases which are embraced within the inhibition of rule 3 of the rules of professional conduct above set forth.

[3] Upon the hearing of the two accusations presented against the petitioner before the administrative committee of the State Bar much evidence was presented relating to the relationship existing between the petitioner and the two unlicensed persons who, through the process known as "ambulance chasing" obtained from the persons injured, or their relatives named in said accusations, the agreements under and in pursuance of which the petitioner was professionally employed to represent such injured persons in actions wherein he appeared as their attorney of record, and in the course of which he received as his fees a portion of the money the said unlicensed persons were entitled to retain under their agreements with the persons, or their relatives, who had sustained the injuries out of which the employment of the petitioner arose. An examination of such evidence convinces us of the sufficiency thereof to justify the findings and conclusions of the administrative committee of the State Bar to the effect that the petitioner accepted professional employment on behalf of the persons named as plaintiffs in the personal injury cases referred to in said accusations, and that such professional employment was offered to the petitioner and knowingly accepted by him as a result of and as incident to the activities of such unlicensed persons who, for compensation, controlled, directed, and influenced such employment, and who shared with the petitioner the compensation which arose out of and was incident thereto. We do not deem it necessary to deal in further detail with respect to said evidence or to the findings of the administrative committee or the final conclusion of the Board of Governors of the State Bar based thereon. We are satisfied from the record before us that the petitioner was justly censurable and that the recommendation of the Board of Governors of the State Bar that he be suspended from the practice of the law for the period of one year should be confirmed.

It is therefore ordered that the petitioner be suspended from practice as an attorney and counselor at law of this state for the period of one year from and after the filing of this order.

McCOULOU v. VEJAR.

L. A. 11108.

Supreme Court of California.

March 25, 1931.

1. Automobiles 🔑244(36).

In action for injuries in automobile crossing collision, evidence supported implied finding that defendant's negligence was sole proximate cause of accident.

> Evidence showed defendant approached intersection at high speed and struck plaintiff's car as he entered paved highway from private road.

2. Automobiles 🔑245(80).

In action for injuries in automobile crossing collision, plaintiff's testimony held not to show, as matter of law, contributory negligence.

3. Automobiles 🔑246(20).

In automobile collision case, refusal of instruction that there was no speed limit on highways held not error (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30).

> The proposed instruction contained an incorrect statement of the law and was properly refused, although California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30, does not purport to fix any definite number of miles per hour at which speed driver may propel automobile and escape responsibility on claim that he did not exceed such speed limit.

4. Automobiles 🔑168(1).

Court properly informed jury that maximum legal rate of speed of automobile on public highway in neither residence nor business district was 40 miles per hour.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; H. S. Ames, Judge.

Action by H. T. McCoulou against Alfonso R. Vejar. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

George L. Green, and Z. B. West, Jr., and S. B. Kaufman, both of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Crowell L. Ormsby and Joseph L. Fainer, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J.

The defendant appeals from a judgment entered against him for $8,000 and costs in an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries caused by a collision between an automobile driven by plaintiff and another automobile driven by the defendant. Respondent having failed to file any reply to the appellant's opening brief, the cause stands submitted upon an order to the respondent to show cause why the judgment should not be reversed.

The collision occurred at about 7:30 o'clock on an evening in January. Plaintiff was driving his automobile easterly on a private road in the county of Orange. According to the evidence in support of the plaintiff, when about fifty feet from the point where the private road intersects Carolina avenue, a paved highway, he first saw the defendant's machine approaching the intersection from the north and on his left, and approximately one-quarter of a mile away. Plaintiff thereupon proceeded the intervening distance to the intersection, stopped his car, looked to the north and south on Carolina avenue, and, assuming that he had ample time to cross the paved roadway to the easterly side and turn to the north thereon before defendant would arrive at the intersection, he gave the required hand signal indicating a left-hand turn, and proceeded on to Carolina avenue. As plaintiff's car entered that avenue, defendant was approximately three hundred feet away. Plaintiff then for the first time discovered that the defendant was traveling at an excessive rate of speed. In an endeavor to avoid a collision the plaintiff accelerated his car, but to no avail. As his car reached the center of the roadway defendant's machine violently struck plaintiff's car on the left side. Plaintiff and his minor son were thrown from the machine and rendered unconscious.

A disinterested witness testified that just prior to the accident, and when approximately one-half mile north of the intersection, the defendant was traveling "not less than fifty miles" an hour. Defendant's version is to the effect that when he was about fifty feet north of the intersection, and traveling at a speed of thirty miles an hour, he saw the plaintiff's car proceeding at a moderate rate of speed, at about an equal distance from the intersection; that plaintiff decreased his speed as though he intended stopping, and then suddenly "stepped on it" with the resulting collision.

[1, 2] The evidence is conflicting. Our examination of the record satisfies us that there is ample support therein for the jury's implied finding that the negligence of the defendant was the sole and proximate cause of the accident. Nor do we find any merit in the contention that plaintiff's own testimony proves him to have been contributorily negligent as a matter of law in attempting, under the circumstances, to cross the path of a vehicle proceeding along Carolina avenue. A similar contention, based on a state of facts substantially identical with those now before us, was found to be without merit in the recent case of Cherry v. Delaney (Cal. App.) 290 P. 895. As there pointed out, the circumstances under which a court can declare that certain acts constitute contributory negligence as matter of law are rare. Whether plaintiff acted in a reasonable and prudent manner in thus attempting to cross in front of the defendant's car presented, along with the other issues in the case, merely a question of fact which the jury resolved in plaintiff's favor.

[3, 4] Appellant argues that the court erred in refusing an instruction which, if given, would have told the jury that "there is no speed limit on the highways of this state. * * *" The proposed instruction contained an incorrect statement of the law and was properly refused. While it is true that section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1927, p. 1436) does not purport to fix any definite number of miles per hour at which speed a driver may propel an automobile and escape responsibility on the claim that he did not exceed such speed limit, but rather requires that motor vehicles be driven at all times and under all circumstances "at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having due regard to the traffic, surface and width of the highway, * * *" and so as not "to endanger the life, limb or property of any person" (subd. a), yet the section does specify certain maximum speed limits for designated places beyond which it is unlawful to propel a motor vehicle (subds. b and c). In this connection see Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 282, 283, 277 P. 1045; Krause v. Rarity (Cal. Sup.) 293 P. 62; Buzby v. Lewis, 103 Cal. App. 124, 126, 127, 283 P. 958; Armstrong v. Day, 103 Cal. App. 465, 471, 284 P. 1083; Davis v. Brown, 92 Cal. App. 20, 24, 267 P. 754. The court therefore properly refused the instruction and correctly informed the jury that at the time of the accident here involved "the maximum legal rate of speed of an automobile traveling on a public highway, * * * where said highway is in neither a residence district nor a business district, is forty (40) miles per hour."

We have examined the remaining two instructions designated by the defendant, one of which was given and the other refused, and find nothing of a prejudicial character in the court's action. The charge to the jury was full, fair, and accurate, and covered all of the issues in the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from an order granting a preliminary injunction. The action was brought against some forty-three oil producers in the Santa Fé Springs oil field in Los Angeles county to enjoin the unreasonable waste of natural gas pursuant to the provisions of the so-called Oil and Gas Conservation Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1404), as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 923). After notice and hearing, the court, on March 19, 1930, issued a temporary injunction as prayed for in the complaint. The terms of this injunction were modified on March 28, 1930. From the injunction as modified this appeal was taken by three of the defendants in the action, to wit, Twin Bell Syndicate, Second Twin Bell Syndicate, and Star Petroleum Company. An application was then made by these appellants for a writ of supersedeas to stay the operation of the injunction pending the appeal therefrom. The application was denied by this court on December 3, 1930. People v. Associated Oil Co. et al., 294 P. 717.

The order appealed from is attacked first on the ground that the statute under which the action was brought is unconstitutional, and, secondly, that the injunction issued is void as to these appellants by reason of alleged discrimination against them, but particularly as against the operations of well No. 4 of the Star Petroleum Company.

The questions involving the alleged unconstitutionality of the statute were presented for determination and were decided by this court contrary to the appellants' contentions upon the application for the writ of supersedeas. The terms of the temporary injunction were also set forth in the opinion rendered on that application.

It will be unnecessary to discuss the several questions raised by the appellants as to the alleged unconstitutionality of the statute for the reason that they are the same as those presented and determined in the former proceeding. It was also there stated by this court that, conceding the effect of the preliminary injunction to be that Star Well No. 4 would have to be shut down, the showing of the unreasonable waste of gas therefrom would justify it.

When the matter of the present appeal came on for argument on December 5, 1930, counsel for the appellants stated that the effect of the preliminary injunction had been in fact to kill Star well No. 4, and that the circumstances thereof demonstrated the discriminatory character of the injunction order as to that company; whereupon counsel for the respondent immediately disputed the fact. Thereafter on December 9, 1930, the respondent filed an application herein for leave to produce evidence pursuant to section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure as interpreted in Tupman v. Haberkern, 208 Cal. 256, 280 P. 970. In response to the application an appropriate order was entered in the minutes of this court; the Hon. Leon R. Yankwich, a judge of the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, was appointed a referee to take the evidence either orally or by affidavit and report the same to this court. In due time the referee filed his report which consists of affidavits and exhibits attached thereto presented by the respective parties. This evidence shows beyond dispute that Star well No. 4 has been on continuous production from a time prior to the commencement of the action until the expiration of the time covered by the referee's report, which included the entire month of December, 1930. During the month of March, 1930, when the original injunctive order was issued, the daily average production of gas in the entire Santa Fé Springs oil field was 565,705,000 cubic feet per day. The injunctive order fixed the allowable daily production at 334,000,000 cubic feet per day. Taking into consideration and eliminating the amount of gas put to beneficial use, the court determined that any additional blow into the air in excess of 100,000,000 cubic feet per day was unreasonable waste. The Star Petroleum Company was originally allowed 3,000,000 cubic feet per day. By the modified order this company was allowed 3,285,000 cubic feet per day. This was an allowance to these appellants of 4,000 cubic feet of gas to each barrel of oil produced, as against an average of 2,600 cubic feet of gas to each barrel of oil throughout the entire field. On this state of the facts, any claim of unlawful discrimination between the Star Petroleum Company and other operators in the field would seem to be without merit.

[1] The record now before us shows that from March until June of 1930 the Star Petroleum Company far exceeded the allowance of gas specified in the order of court, and that it came within the allowance only because the average daily production of gas in the entire field declined to such an extent that this company could not produce even the allowable amount, due to the depletion of gas in the zones in the field. In January of this year the daily average of production of gas in the entire field was reduced to 177,251,000 cubic feet. This reduction was due wholly to the decrease in gas pressure in the various sands of the field. The production of oil in the whole field was necessarily reduced proportionately. It therefore appears that the effort on the part of the state to prevent the improvident and wasteful use of natural gas has been frustrated by unregulated operations in the field or by operations conducted in spite of attempted regulation, with the result that the further recovery of oil in the discovered zones in this field has been unduly reduced by the heretofore wasteful process, and that such further recovery must depend on artificial gas repressuring or putting the wells on pumps. It is estimated that only about 20 per cent. of the gas has been beneficially used, and that a very large proportion of the oil deposit has not been recovered from the discovered and developed zones in this field. It would seem to require no argument to support the statement that such a situation falls within the purview of public regulation under the police power, not only to the end of protecting the correlative rights of the owners and operators in this field, but also the rights of the public which has a direct interest in safeguarding this important natural resource.

[2] The appellants, particularly the Star Petroleum Company with reference to its well No. 4, insist that, if it had been compelled to observe the injunctive order, it would have been required to shut down the well, but there is no showing that it endeavored to comply with the order by "beaning back" (restricting the outlet), or by the employment of other means to prevent the prohibited waste. It is insisted that this appellant is being penalized because it happened to strike the top of the structure where the gas pressure was greatest. In effect this is a contention that it should be permitted to exercise a right to the prejudice of a coequal right possessed by its neighbors in the field. This contention cannot be sustained on well-known principles of law with reference to the exercise of rights in private property generally, but it also runs counter to adjudications on the subject of gas and oil development regulations by the highest court in the land. Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 20 S. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729; Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 31 S. Ct. 337, 55 L. Ed. 369, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 160; Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 31 S. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734; Walls v. Midland Carbon Co., 254 U. S. 300, 41 S. Ct. 118, 65 L. Ed. 276. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have recognized and determined that the states have the right to enact laws, under the police power, providing for the conservation of the oil and gas resources within their borders, and that such laws, if not clearly arbitrary or unreasonable, do not contravene the due process and equal protection provisions of the federal Constitution nor take property for public use without compensation. In harmony with the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States in the foregoing cases, conservation measures have been approved by the highest courts of the oil and gas producing states, as is shown by the many cases cited from those jurisdictions in the briefs of the respondent and amicus curiæ, with the exception of Montana. Gas Products Co. v. Rankin, 63 Mont. 372, 207 P. 993, 24 A. L. R. 294.

[3] We reiterate that the legislation in question has lawfully vested in the superior court the power to determine what wastage of gas in the production of oil is reasonable or unreasonable. Whether such wastage be reasonable or unreasonable is a question of fact and should be determined in view of the necessity of one land owner to make productive use of his parcel, in view of the equal right of the adjoining owners not to be deprived of correlative production from their parcels, and in view of the right of the public to prevent the waste of that which cannot be replaced.

[4] The preliminary injunction generally is supported by the facts presented to the court. That these particular appellants have not been discriminated against is evidenced by the terms of the order itself and by the record present before the trial court and before this court on the supplemental hearing.

The order is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by the A. L. Young Machinery Company against I. H. Cupps and others, including the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America. From a judgment of dismissal in favor of Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, plaintiff appeals.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of dismissal in favor of defendant insurance company entered after the trial court had sustained a demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint without leave to amend. The facts as set forth in plaintiff's complaint, so far as necessary to be considered on this appeal, are as follows:

On November 26, 1924, defendant Cupps entered into a contract with the county of San Joaquin for the construction of a designated public highway in that county for the total sum of $10,459.50. On December 4, 1924, Cupps filed with the board of supervisors of the county of San Joaquin a bond in the sum of one-half the contract price, naming the defendant insurance company as surety. The bond specifically recited that it was given and executed pursuant to the Public Works Act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487). It is then alleged that during the performance of the work under this contract, and between January 13 and February 16, 1926, the plaintiff sold, delivered, and furnished to the contractor certain materials, supplies, implements, and machinery, consisting of one 30-foot steel frame bucket elevator complete; one 36 by 12 inch screen; a one-yard drag scraper; and certain pulleys, belts, lanterns, hose, and extension for the elevator; that there still remains due and unpaid on the above articles the sum of $1,405.75. It is then specifically alleged that the above equipment was "furnished for use under the contract above mentioned and were used in, upon, for and about the work contracted to be executed and performed under said contract, and were totally used up, consumed, destroyed and worn out in, upon, for and about the performance of said work under said contract, and at the completion of said work had no further use or value for the purpose for which they were constructed, and were without salvage value." The date of completion of the work and the filing of the verified claim and withhold notice required by the statute are then alleged, it appearing from such allegations that these steps were all taken within the time and in the manner provided by law. Plaintiff asks judgment against the surety on its bond for the amount of the unpaid balance on the purchase price of the above equipment.

[1-3] The trial court, holding the view that the purchase price of such equipment was not covered by the bond, sustained a demurrer without leave to amend. Respondent surety company contended on the demurrer, and contends now, that it is not liable on the bond for the purchase price of such equipment, on the theory that the bond required by the public works statute allows recovery only for the reasonable rental value of such equipment, when such equipment is in fact rented, and allows no recovery for the purchase price thereof.

As stated above, the bond in question was a statutory bond given and executed under the 1919 act, as it then read. That act provides that on public work the contractor must give a bond for at least one-half of the contract price of the work, which bond must guarantee that if the contractor "fails to pay for any materials, provisions, provender or other supplies, or teams, used in, upon, for or about the performance of the work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, that the surety or sureties will pay the same. * * *" The bond issued by respondent is broader in many respects than the bond required by the statute. Both appellant and respondent devote the major portion of their briefs to the question as to whether those provisions in the bond more onerous than those required by the statute can be enforced against the surety. It is not necessary to determine that point on this appeal. It is our opinion that the expressions "materials" and "supplies" found in the statute are sufficiently broad to include equipment of the nature involved herein, when such equipment is purchased for the particular job, and is entirely consumed thereon, except for normal salvage value. It is true, of course, that the purchase price of equipment capable of being used on more than one job, and which becomes part of the contractor's general equipment, is not covered by the statute, but when the equipment is of such a nature that in the usual course of events it will be entirely used and consumed on the particular job for which it was purchased, it is our opinion that such equipment is included within the meaning of "materials" and "supplies," as used by the statute. Respondent cites several mechanics' lien cases which indicate that in those cases the lien extends only to those articles which physically go into the structure against which the lien is sought to be exerted. Those cases are not in point. It has repeatedly been held in reference to the 1919 act, and its predecessors, that such acts are to be more liberally construed than the mechanic's lien statutes, and that the reasons for giving a limited construction to the latter are not applicable to the former. Pacific Wood & Coal Co. v. Oswald, 179 Cal. 712, 178 P. 854; Sherman v. Amer. Surety Co., 178 Cal. 286, 173 P. 161; French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 P. 92; Associated Oil Co. v. Commary-Peterson Co., 32 Cal. App. 582, 163 P. 702. It has been held under the 1919 act and similar public work statutes, that rental of machinery, money, expended on the hiring of mule teams, money spent for provisions, harness, and other equipment, including scrapers, freight on mules and equipment, etc., are all recoverable against the surety. Williamson v. Egan (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 503; Pacific Wood & Coal Co. v. Oswald, supra; Bricker v. Rollins & Jarecki, 178 Cal. 347, 173 P. 592, 594; Sherman v. Amer. Surety Co., supra; People's Nat. Bank v. Southern Surety Co. (Cal. App.) 288 P. 827. The theory of these cases is that the statute was intended to cover all those things which have contributed to the improvement, whether directly by physically going into the construction, or indirectly, by being entirely consumed or used in the construction. In discussing the word "supplies," as used in a previous statute, the court in Bricker v. Rollins & Jarecki, supra, stated: "The ordinary meaning of this term in its general and accepted use is such as to include goods, wares, and merchandise of almost every kind and nature, whether used in the household or on the farm, or in any sort of productive or constructive work requiring the labor or service of men or animals or machinery. In the instant case they were furnished to be used and were actually used in advancing the work to be done under this contract, and in that sense entered into and became a component part of it and of the thing produced by it. This being so, we are of the opinion that as to the above classes of claims the trial court was correct in their allowance."

The true test in such cases was indicated by the Supreme Court of South Dakota in the recent case of Dennis v. Enke, 224 N. W. 925. In that case the question involved was whether the seller of a $3,000 tractor could recover from the surety the balance of the purchase price on a bond somewhat similar to the one here involved. We take the liberty of quoting from that case at some length. At page 927 of 224 N. W., that court, after analyzing certain earlier cases, stated:

"This court has indicated in those cases that absolute and entire consumption in the work is not essential to liability, and liability is not necessarily prevented by the fact that there may be some salvage value in the materials or other supplies. It is enough if they were purchased directly and particularly for the work, were proper for the work, and were used therein, and consumed therein to such an extent that their residual value is a salvage value only as distinguished from a new value, as illustrated by pipe cut and threaded in certain lengths, lumber cut up and nailed in place to make a tool shed or a form for cement, etc. That these items have some residual value is of course true, but it is a very different value both in kind and amount from that of new lumber or new pipe in standard lengths and dimensions, and this court has held, under the circumstances of the cases heretofore considered, that the existence of some such residual salvage value did not necessarily prevent liability on the part of the surety.

"The same rule was applied to the matter of minor tools and appliances in the Dennis Case [53 S. D. 646], 222 N. W. 269, where the items involved were two scrapers at $25.50 each, and certain repair items, and where the court below found as a fact (the appeal being from the judgment only) that all of the items were purchased for the purposes of the contract and were practically worn out in carrying out the provisions of the contract."

Again, at page 927 of 224 N. W., it is stated:

"It is a matter of common knowledge that the performance of contracts of this kind requires a plant and equipment suitable therefor, many items of which are expensive and the purchase of which could not be justified by any single contract unless it was extremely large. It is further a matter of common knowledge that this kind of work is generally performed by persons who engage therein as a business and who maintain, for the purpose of the general contracting business, a very considerable amount of equipment intended and designed to be used in that business over a period of several years and in the performance of a number of contracts. We do not think it can be said to be within the contemplation of the parties that the surety on such a bond as this should be liable for the purchase price of tools and appliances which constitute and create, or become a part of, the general plant and equipment of the contractor, as distinguished from those minor tools and appliances which are consumed or practically consumed in the performance of a particular contract. The underlying principle which distinguishes between liability and nonliability is comparatively easy to perceive and grasp, difficult to phrase accurately, and still more difficult to apply precisely in border line cases. There must always be somewhat of a twilight zone in these cases between liability and nonliability dependent upon the facts in particular cases. The problem is similar to that faced by the cost accountant of a manufacturing plant in determining whether a certain tool or appliance should be charged as a direct expense item to a particular job, or should be charged to plant and equipment; the established cost of its use in the particular job being ultimately taken into account by being embraced in the percentage of general overhead expense of plant equipment and factory charged to the particular job.

"In order to create liability on the part of the surety for the purchase price of tools and appliances under these contract bonds, at least the following elements we think must be present: First, the tool or appliance must be purchased specifically and particularly for use in the performance of the particular contract; second, the use of such tool or appliance must be at least proper, if not reasonably necessary, in connection with and about the carrying out of the contract; third, the tool or appliance must be used in or about the performance of the contract; fourth, the tool or appliance must be such that it is reasonably to be expected in the natural course of events that its normal life for the purpose for which it was designed will be practically consumed by its use in and about the performance of the contract, and in this connection the facts of each particular case must be taken into consideration. For example, general experience indicates that a crew of men engaged in the performance of a contract of this kind lose and break numerous small tools and items of equipment, such as shovels, spades, hammers, etc., by reason of which they are for all practical purposes really consumed in the performance of the contract, notwithstanding the fact that such tools, if carefully handled and not lost, would be far from worn out by the actual amount of work for which they are used in the performance of a particular contract. If such small tools are purchased for the performance of the contract, are proper or reasonably necessary therefor, are used in such performance, and in such performance are lost or broken, and such loss or breakage is reasonably to be anticipated, it is entirely possible that the surety on the bond might be liable."

[4] The articles herein involved fully comply with all the requirements suggested by the above case. It is our opinion that if the articles in question were totally used up in the usual and ordinary performance of the contract, so that nothing remained in excess of normal salvage, they then lost their identity as tools, appliances, implements, and machinery, and are included within the broader definition of the words "materials" and "supplies." In such a case, in effect, they entered into and became a component part of the construction work. Certainly it is true that their full usefulness has entered into the work to the same extent as has hay for the horses or food for the men. Each case must be determined on its own facts. In the case at bar, the plaintiff has alleged the articles were purchased for the particular job and were entirely used up and consumed thereon. The truth of these allegations is admitted on demurrer. We are of the opinion that it was error to sustain the general demurrer without leave to amend. It is our opinion that plaintiff not only can, but has stated a cause of action. We do not mean by this to forecast the result of the action which, of course, must await upon the character of the evidence adduced at the trial.

Defendant surety, in addition to the general demurrer, also demurred specially to the complaint. It may be that several of these specifications are meritorious. It is therefore ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the case remanded to the trial court, with instructions to overrule the general demurrer and to pass upon the various specifications of special demurrer.

Appeal from Superior Court, of Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action to annul a lease and recover possession of premises brought by George Dack against J. R. Northrop and others, in which Lee Milton Campbell and another, executors of the last will and testament of George Dack, deceased, were substituted as parties plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for respondents.

PRESTON, J.

This action was instituted on September 6, 1927, to annul a lease made by plaintiff George Dack to defendant Lillian B. Northrop on the 1st day of April, 1926, and to recover possession of the premises covered thereby. The plaintiff died on April 14, 1928, a short time before the trial of the action, and his executors were substituted as parties plaintiff in his stead. The word "plaintiff" as used in this opinion will refer to the original plaintiff, the decedent George Dack.

The cause of action counted upon fraud and undue influence, asserted to be of a sufficient degree and strength to warrant a rescission of the instrument. Issue was joined upon the allegations of the amended complaint and trial was had, followed by elaborate and sweeping findings of fact, followed by a judgment sustaining in toto the averments made, from which judgment defendants have prosecuted this appeal. No serious contention is made touching the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a rescission upon the ground of fraud and undue influence. This fact is practically shown by the terms of the instrument itself, when read in the light of the surrounding circumstances, together with the physical and mental condition of the plaintiff. However, it is necessary, for a proper consideration of the points urged, to set forth briefly certain of the facts and circumstances.

Plaintiff at the time in question was eighty-five years of age, with a life expectancy of 2.77 years, in failing health and in an extremely weak mental condition, being childish and obsessed with an abnormal sense of his own fascinations and power over the opposite sex. He owned eighty acres of land, known as the George Dack Mountain Ranch Garage and Camp Grounds, together with a valuable water right appurtenant thereto. Previous to the time in question he had leased to one Miller the garage on said property. Miller in turn attempted to transfer this lease to the defendants, who in the year 1925 took possession of said garage. From this period until after the instrument in question was executed plaintiff boarded with the defendant Lillian Northrop. The evidence is plain that during all this time said defendant set on foot a systematic line of conduct to overreach and control the will power and action of said plaintiff. Her influence and power over him she frequently admitted. There is considerable evidence that in order to secure the lease in question she even went so far as to display her physical charms over the old man. The terms of the lease show a demise period of twenty years, with a monthly rental of $6, payable, however, only "during the life" of plaintiff. The court found the monthly rental value of the property to have been, on the date of the lease $50.

Said property is located on the state highway, between Redding and Dunsmuir, north of Gibson, Shasta county. It was used as a garage and camping ground. A survey developed the fact that part of the camp buildings mentioned in the lease were on the land of the adjoining owner, Martin, and it was necessary to move the buildings over onto the Dack property. This the defendants did. In addition they erected a cabin, from which they received $10 per month rent, a second cabin from which they received $12.50 per month rent, and a cookhouse from which they received $20 per month rent. After securing the lease defendants also went outside the boundaries of the camp grounds, but on land of the plaintiff, cleared such additional land, and built cabins thereon. They also constructed a camp for the highway engineers on the same property, but outside that portion thereof covered by the lease. They also permitted a concern known as the North Beach Auto Hauling Company to build a camp on the property under an arrangement whereby the buildings would belong to the defendants when vacated.

The grounds urged for reversal, although appearing in different forms, really amount to the claim that, before granting a rescission in this case, a court of equity should have required, as a condition precedent, that plaintiff refund to defendants all outlays made by them for the above and other improvements on the property. In this respect the court found that after execution of the lease, on April 1, 1926, defendants encroached upon and occupied real property belonging to the plaintiff and adjoining that described in the lease but not embraced therein, and constructed improvements thereon; that said injury to and occupancy of such land and said construction of improvements thereon was without the consent of and against the will of plaintiff and the improvements were the result of a wrongful and unlawful trespass upon plaintiff's lands. The court then concluded with this finding: "It is true that said George Dack did not offer to reimburse defendants herein for any expenditures made and that the said George Dack and these plaintiffs did not offer to restore defendants to their former position, but in this behalf the court finds that the use of the property of said George Dack and the withholding of the same from the owner, as hereinabove expressly found, sufficiently compensated said defendants for any payments made or detriment suffered by said defendants and that the case is not one in which an offer of restoration was necessary before bringing this action."

The basis for appellants' attack is found in the facts shown in the findings above summarized. In the first place, it is contended that the complaint is defective in that notice was not given of a rescission nor was an offer of restoration made, and, secondly, that the laches of plaintiff in bringing the action were so great that on the merits no rescission should be decreed without provision to restore defendants to their status quo by providing for the repayment to them of all sums spent in and about the improvement of the property and construction of the buildings in question.

[1] Respondents meet the question respecting the complaint by citing the following cases: Wilson v. Moriarty, 77 Cal. 596, 20 P. 134; Whyte v. Rosencrantz, 123 Cal. 634, 56 P. 436, 69 Am. St. Rep. 90; Isom v. Rex Crude Oil Co., 147 Cal. 659, 662, 663, 82 P. 317, from which we deduce the conclusion that where the party against whom rescission is claimed is in possession of the property involved and has thereby received the full benefit of all money expended on the property, an offer of restoration is not required to maintain an action for a cancellation of the instrument and restoration of possession of the property.

[2] Coming now to the merits of the case, the court found, as above stated, that the value of the use and occupation of the premises by defendants was an offset to any outlays made by them. We are not prepared to say that the evidence does not support this finding. Moreover, had the court been required to decree any relief of this nature it would only have been the amount representing the enhanced value of the land due to such improvements, and the cost thereof was not a proper criterion. Conlan v. Sullivan, 110 Cal. 624, 42 P. 1081; Petit v. Flint, etc., Co., 119 Mich. 492, 78 N. W. 554, 75 Am. St. Rep. 417; Fountain v. Semi-Tropic Co., 99 Cal. 677, 34 P. 497. But we search in vain in the record for any evidence that the value of plaintiff's property was to any extent enhanced by the outlays in question.

Further discussion is unnecessary. It follows from the above that the judgment of the court below should be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. QUICK.

L. A. 10936.

Supreme Court of California.

March 24, 1931.

Limitation of actions ⚷148(4).

Letter written by maker of note to attorney complaining of treatment accorded him was not unequivocal recognition of existing indebtedness sufficient to stay running of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1).

The letter purporting to be a response to letter written by attorney presumably demanding payment of note contained a series of complaints against payee for its unfair treatment of maker of note with relation to properties and securities which payee held and which should have been applied to payment of note, and closed with the statement that, "I would be very glad to see you and talk this matter over with you, for I feel like that I have not had a square deal."

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; V. N. Thompson, Judge.

Action by the Security Trust & Savings Bank against D. L. Quick. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert G. Hill, of San Diego, for appellant.

C. B. Smith, of El Centro, and Alford & Wilford, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court of Imperial county, in favor of the defendant and respondent in an action brought by the plaintiff upon a promissory note executed by the defendant to the First National Bank of Seeley, on January 4, 1921, for the sum of $1,320, with interest, payable on June 4, 1921, and which note after maturity had been assigned to the plaintiff herein. The action was commenced on June 11, 1925, to recover a balance alleged to be due on said note, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, and for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage upon certain cattle and horses given by the defendant to secure the same. The plaintiff alleged in its complaint that on November 19, 1924, the defendant acknowledged that the promissory note sued on therein was a subsisting indebtedness against him. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it appeared upon the face thereof that the action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court overruled the demurrer, whereupon the defendant answered, denying liability on the note, and setting up several defenses thereto, including that of the statute of limitations which had theretofore been asserted by him in his demurrer. Upon the trial of the cause the plaintiff introduced a letter which the defendant admitted having written on November 19, 1924, to the attorney for the plaintiff, and which read as follows:

"Niland, Cal., Nov. 19, 1924.
"Mr. Robert G. Hill,
"El Centro, Calif.

"Your letter received. Will say in reply that the stock that the First National Bank that Seeley had a mortgage on I left them on pasture in the Paliverda Valley near Blythe in June, 1922, where they are now I do not know. I informed the bank at Seeley and the bank in Los Angeles that I could not keep them any longer as I had no money, feed was very high and I had to go to work for wages to make a living for my family and self. Neither bank made no reply I have been informed that they were sold some time ago for pasture bill I came back here to this valley June 10th, 1922, have been here ever since.

"The First National Bank of Seeley is holding a judgment of mine which I got against the Harris brothers for $600.00 cost and attorney fee which amounts to almost $900.00 which they refuse to sign over to me it did not belong to them any more than it did to you or any other man unknown in the matter. My attorney Harry Horton can tell you all about it. I also turned over six bales of cotton whether I ever received any credit for any of this I don't know. I would be very glad to see you and talk this matter over for I feel like that I have not had a square deal.

"Very respectfully yours,

It was this letter upon which the plaintiff relied to defeat defendant's plea of the statute of limitations. Upon the submission of the cause the trial court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law wherein it found and concluded that the foregoing letter did not constitute such an acknowledgment in writing of the existence of the obligation and of a subsisting indebtedness against him thereon as would serve to relieve plaintiff of the operation of the statute of limitations. It accordingly rendered judgment in defendant's favor upon the ground, among others, that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Plaintiff has appealed from said judgment and has filed its opening brief herein. Respondent has filed no brief in reply and has made no response to an order to show cause.

The record herein consists solely of the judgment roll and letter which is above set forth. We are satisfied with the findings and conclusions of the trial court with reference to the effect of said letter. The letter purports to be a response to a letter written by the plaintiff's attorney, presumably demanding payment of the note. The letter contains a series of complaints against the Bank of Seeley for its unfair treatment of him with relation to the properties and securities which it held and which should have been applied to the payment of said note. The letter closes with the statement: "I would be very glad to see you and talk this matter over with you, for I feel like that I have not had a square deal." We are satisfied that such a letter could not reasonably be interpreted as containing such an unequivocal recognition of an existing indebtedness as would serve to stay the running of the statute of limitations. This is the conclusion which the trial court arrived at, and the authorities cited by the appellant in its opening brief do not, in our opinion, suffice to overthrow that conclusion or to justify a reversal of the judgment of the trial court based thereon.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

3. Negligence 🔑138(4).

Defendants' instruction on question of joint or common enterprise between plaintiff and driver of automobile at time of collision held properly refused under evidence.

> Evidence showed that plaintiff was minor; that she had accompanied her two older sisters on their vacation; that plaintiff had no ownership or interest in automobile and had never driven same and had no control over car or action or conduct of two sisters in operating same.

4. Automobiles 🔑246(2).

Instructions on duty of driver of automobile to anticipate presence of others on highway, using word "vigilant," held not erroneous.

> Instruction complained of, in substance, told jury that driver had no right to assume that road was clear, but that he must be most "vigilant" and must anticipate presence of others, and the fact that he did not know that any one was on highway was no excuse for conduct which would have amounted to recklessness if he had known that another vehicle or person was on highway. Term "vigilant" is defined as "watchful, awake and on the alert; attentive to discover and avoid danger, or to provide for safety; circumspect; cautious; wary."

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Edward Henderson, Judge.

Action by Eva Grace Mathews, a minor, by Charles O. Mathews, guardian ad litem, against George A. Dudley and another, doing business under the fictitious name and style of the National Linen Supply Company, and another. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal.

RICHARDS, J.

This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Ventura, rendered and entered after the verdict of a jury in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $35,000, in an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by her in an automobile collision which occurred upon what is known as the Old Conejo grade which lies along the highway between Ventura and Los Angeles, and on which the Ford automobile in which the plaintiff was riding and which was being driven by one of her elder sisters, while ascending said grade, was struck by a Reo truck owned by the defendants George A. Dudley and Maybelle M. Dudley, doing business under the fictitious name and style of National Linen Supply Company, and being at the time driven by Raymond Dudley, acting in the operation of the same under the authority of the owners of said truck.

[1] The appellants make four contentions upon this appeal, the first of which is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in the admission of certain evidence over their objection. The evidence in question was that of a witness for the plaintiff named Overly, who was driving an automobile down said grade a short distance behind the Reo truck and a short while before the collision. Overly did not see the collision, but he did observe the Reo truck and the place it was occupying upon the highway as it rounded several of the curves therein and in the course thereof just a short distance above the place where the collision occurred. The highway at this point is, as to the concrete portion thereof, twenty feet wide, and down the center thereof there was painted a white strip. The testimony of Overly was to the effect that as the Reo truck was being driven down said grade and came within the line of his vision as it rounded the curves in the road and proceeded down the grade it was traveling with its left wheels on the left-hand side of the white line on the highway, and that the truck kept this position on the highway up to the time when it was last within his vision and which was but a short space and a few seconds at most before the collision occurred. The objection which the defendants urged to the introduction of this evidence was that it failed to show that the witness saw the accident or saw the position upon the highway which the truck occupied with relation to the center thereof at the moment of the occurrence of the collision. We can perceive no merit in this contention, since the testimony of this witness had relation to a course of conduct which was being pursued by the driver of the truck for a considerable distance in the course of its descent along said highway and up to within a very short distance and a very brief space of time before his truck collided with the car in which the plaintiff was riding. In support of their contention the appellants cite but one California case, that of Blackford v. Beckworth, 90 Cal. App. 37, 265 P. 514, in which case it was held error to admit testimony of a driver's habit six months prior to a collision while traveling in a place eight miles distant from the place of the accident. This decision has no relevancy to the facts of the instant case, since the question to which the testimony of the witness Overly was directed related to the conduct and course of proceeding of the driver of the truck at a place but a short distance above and at a time immediately prior to the accident. The question before the court had relation to the weight and not to the admissibility of the testimony of the witness Overly and the questions of its remoteness, in view of the fact that the witness did not see the collision, was one which rested in the sound discretion of the trial judge as to the admission or rejection of such evidence. In the recent case of Ritchey v. Watson, 204 Cal. 387, 268 P. 345, this court had occasion to pass upon this precise question, wherein evidence was offered as to the speed of a bus a few hundred feet distant from where the collision between it and the plaintiff's car occurred and in which it was held that the admission of such evidence laid within the sound discretion of the trial court, and that its ruling thereon would not be disturbed upon appeal in the absence of a showing of a manifest abuse of such discretion. In the case of Traynor v. McGilvray, 54 Cal. App. 31, 200 P. 1056, 1057, the question was presented as to the admissibility of evidence with relation to the action and conduct of a party, particularly as to the rate of speed and method of driving an automobile, just before a collision occurred, and with respect to which the court said: "We do not regard it as significant that these witnesses did not actually see the impact of the machines, since they were within 500 or 600 feet of the point of impact, which occurred within a few seconds after the existence of the conditions which they related." The most recent decision of this court touching this question is that of Hughes v. Hartman, 206 Cal. 199, 273 P. 560, in which the evidence of a witness was offered and admitted to the effect that he had himself been nearly forced off the grade by the defendant's truck traveling on the wrong side of the road just before the driver thereof had collided with the plaintiff's car. This court held the evidence admissible, although the witness did not actually see the collision with the plaintiff's car. In this connection the plaintiff's witnesses, consisting of herself and her two sisters, who were riding with her in their car at the moment of the collision, all testified that the Reo truck immediately before and at the time of the collision with their car was, as to the portion thereof which struck their machine, some distance over on the left side of the median line of the highway.

[2] The appellants' second contention related to the alleged misconduct of plaintiff's counsel occurring during the argument of the cause. This misconduct, however, if it be such, was not objected to by counsel for the defendants at the time it occurred, nor at any time during the argument, nor until the instructions had been given to the jury and the jury retired to deliberate upon their verdict. The defendants' counsel then for the first time called the attention of the trial court to such alleged misconduct and asked that the jury be recalled for the purpose of further instruction directing them to disregard the specific act of misconduct alleged on the part of plaintiff's counsel. Without reference to the question as to whether or not the comment of plaintiff's counsel amounted to misconduct, we are of the opinion that the objection came too late. Anderson v. United States, 192 Cal. 250, 219 P. 748; Hale v. San Bernardino Valley Traction Co., 156 Cal. 715, 106 P. 83. In this connection it may be noted that, while the defendants in their assignments of error on motion for a new trial stated that the verdict was excessive, as a result of passion and prejudice on the part of the jury, they did not persist in this assertion during the courses of this appeal, and made no reference thereto among the points urged in their brief for a reversal. In this state of the case it would seem that the alleged misconduct of plaintiff's counsel, even if made the subject of time by objection, could not be held to be sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal of the case.

[3] The appellants' third contention is that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by the defendants. As to the first of these instructions, it had reference to the question as to whether the plaintiff was engaged at the time of the accident in such a joint or common enterprise with her two sisters, who were the owners and alternate drivers of the car, as would render her, though a minor, subject to the defense of contributory negligence. The court refused to give the proposed instruction and indorsed thereon the statement that it was "refused, as given in effect elsewhere." An examination of the record shows the court's action in this regard to have been correct, since it had already given two instructions upon the same subject as that covered by the defendants' proposed instruction and in almost the same terms, one at the request of the defendants and the other of its own motion. In addition, however, it may be stated that there is no sufficient evidence contained in the record which would have justified the conclusion that the plaintiff was in fact engaged in a joint or common enterprise with her two sisters in relation to the ownership or operation of the car in which they were riding when the collision occurred. The plaintiff was a minor of the age of fifteen years. Her two sisters were out for a vacation, driving from their home in Bakersfield across to Monterey, and thence by the coast route to Los Angeles. They had brought their younger sister along, but she had no ownership or interest in the car, and had never driven the same, and had no control over the car or the action or conduct of her two sisters in its operation. She was simply their guest on their vacation, and thence cannot be said to have come within the rule with relation to a common enterprise or adventure as that rule has been laid down by this court in the cases of Bryant v. Pac. Electric Co., 174 Cal. 737, 741, 164 P. 385, and Pope v. Halpern, 193 Cal. 168, 173, 223 P. 470. The trial court was, therefore, under no compulsion to give any instruction upon the subject of a joint or common enterprise in so far as the plaintiff in this action was concerned.

[4] The next and final contention urged by the appellants is that the court committed prejudicial error in giving the following instruction:

"You are instructed that a driver has no right to assume that the road is clear, but under all circumstances and at all times he must be vigilant and must anticipate the presence of others. The fact that he did not know that anyone was on the highway is no excuse for conduct which would have amounted to recklessness if he had known that another vehicle or person was on the highway.

"I further instruct you that a person lawfully and carefully driving upon a highway has the right to assume that all persons using the highway will also use ordinary care and caution. This rule allows drivers of motor vehicles to assume that motor vehicle drivers will obey and abide by the traffic laws and regulations."

The gravamen of defendants' objection is directed against the use of the word "vigilant" in the foregoing instruction, and counsel for the appellants quotes certain definitions of that word as given in several dictionaries. The word, however, has numerous significances and synonyms, depending upon the particular place and context in which it is used and also to the subject to which in its various uses it relates. One of the meanings given to this word "vigilant" is that contained in the Century Dictionary, wherein it is defined as "watchful, awake and on the alert; attentive to discover and avoid danger, or to provide for safety; circumspect; cautious; wary." If each of these synonyms of the word "vigilant" had been employed in the instruction complained of, it could hardly, in respect to the duties of the driver of an automobile upon the public highways, be said to have been erroneous. But, however that may be, the instruction complained of has been approved by the appellate tribunals of this state in a number of decisions, some of which are the following: Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 201 P. 471; Wright v. Salzberger, 81 Cal. App. 690, 701, 254 P. 671; Truitner v. Knight, 83 Cal. App. 655, 661, 257 P. 447; Alkus v. Davies, 86 Cal. App. 355, 260 P. 894; Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 317, 237 P. 1066, and Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 99, 239 P. 709, 41 A. L. R. 1027. We discover no prejudicial error in the giving or refusing to give any of the instructions of which the appellants complain, nor any other error on the part of the trial court which would warrant a reversal of this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McCABE.

Cr. 3400.

Homicide ⚷253(1).
Robbery ⚷24(1).

Evidence sustained convictions for murder in first degree and attempted robbery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Wilbur McCabe was convicted for murder in the first degree and attempted robbery, and, from the judgments of conviction and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals.

Frederic H. Vercoe, Public Defender, Franklin Padan, Chief Deputy Public Defender, and R. F. Bird, Deputy Public Defender, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn and James S. Howie, Deputy Attys. Gen., and Charles J. Orbison, of Los Angeles, for the People.

PRESTON, J.

Information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county charged defendant in the first count with the crime of murder and in the second count with the crime of attempted robbery. Defendant admitted prior conviction of a felony, to wit, robbery, for which he had been imprisoned and less than six months previously released on parole. After due proceedings, this cause came to trial, and the jury thereafter returned two verdicts, one finding the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree and the other finding him guilty of attempted robbery. Judgments of conviction followed, imposing the death penalty, and, from said judgments and the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant now prosecutes this appeal.

The record leaves not the slightest doubt concerning the guilt of appellant. It appears that Henry P. Miller, for many years night clerk at the University Club of Los Angeles, came on duty about 11 o'clock p. m. of June 15, 1930. At about 12:35 a. m., the following morning, appellant, armed with a loaded revolver, entered the lobby for the purpose of committing a robbery. Said clerk was seated in his office facing the lobby. Appellant approached and handed him a note reading in substance: "You are stuck up. Don't put you hands up or dare make a sign. If you try to make signs to anyone you will die. Put all cash from drawer into bag and pass it to me. Then get in the closet for five minutes. Slam door shut." The night watchman, making his regular rounds, passed the office, observed the man he later identified as appellant talking to said clerk, heard nothing of what was being said, and passed through a door into the club garage. The clerk, however, was evidently resisting the demands of appellant; at any rate, a scuffle followed, during which appellant fired two shots in quick succession, inflicting fatal wounds from which said clerk died the following day. These shots were heard by said watchman and by the elevator man; thus police and surgeon arrived at the scene within a short time.

During the affray the clerk with his penknife stabbed appellant in the face, causing it to bleed profusely. Appellant fled through the lobby and club garage and through the byways to his room, leaving a trail of blood spots to guide the police to him. They soon apprehended him while in his bathroom endeavoring to cleanse the blood from his face. Here they also found his blood-stained clothing. Along the route taken by appellant to his room, and where cast near the sewer drain, was found the revolver from which said shots were fired, with cylinders missing, but with three loaded shells of the same caliber nearby.

Said clerk, in the consciousness of approaching death, identified the note above set forth, and on two different occasions gave statements describing the whole occurrence and the appearance of the robber. Appellant was taken to his bedside in the hospital, and there, after the bandages were removed from appellant's face, the dying man identified him positively as his assailant. Appellant himself was questioned by the police a number of times, and, although first denying his participation in the crime, later admitted that he went to said club to commit a robbery and shot when he was resisted. Upon the trial, he repudiated all of his admissions of guilt, charging the police with unfair methods in forcing a confession upon him when he was still weak from loss of blood. He claimed that during the period in question he was under the influence of intoxicants, although competent witnesses testified that he was perfectly sober at the time his wounds were treated. In defense, appellant further asserted that decedent was a moral pervert and planned the attempted robbery for him after having engaged with him in numerous acts of depravity. The evidence in refutation of these foul aspersions was both abundant and conclusive.

Appellant therefore finds himself on appeal with the sole contention that the trial court erred in refusing to give two instructions requested by him, one with respect to discretion of the jury as to which punishment should be imposed in the event they found him guilty of murder in the first degree, the other with reference to the death penalty. The contention does not merit a detailed discussion. The charge as given by the court contained a full and correct exposition of the law upon the subject-matter in question. All of the instructions given and requested have received our careful consideration. We find that the charge of the court was ample, complete, free from prejudicial error, and covered all points necessary to a proper determination of the cause. In fact, the entire record is free from prejudicial error.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

Action by F. G. Calhoun against George C. Downs and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

CURTIS, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing the action after an order sustaining demurrers to the amended complaint without leave to amend.

It is alleged in said amended complaint that the defendants George Downs and Lola Downs, who are husband and wife, were the owners of certain real property described therein and situated in the county of San Diego, and that, while such owners, they listed said real property with the plaintiff a duly licensed and commissioned real estate broker, and employed plaintiff to sell said real property for the sum of $10,000, agreeing to pay plaintiff the usual broker's commission of 5 per cent. for making sales of real estate in said county in case the plaintiff should make a sale of said real property, or the sum of $500; that, in pursuance of said agreement, plaintiff procured the defendant, George P. Ahlborn as a purchaser of said real property, who was ready, able, and willing to buy the same for the sum of $10,000, and that on the 13th day of April, 1926, Downs and wife entered into an agreement with the defendant Ahlborn whereby they agreed to sell, and Ahlborn agreed to buy, said real property for the sum of $10,000, and to pay to plaintiff a commission of $500, but in reducing said agreement to writing by the mutual mistake of plaintiff and defendants the figures "500" after the dollar sign and the words "F. G. Calhoun" after the word "to" in the last line of said agreement were omitted therefrom, so that said last line reads as follows: "I agree to pay a commission of $——— to ———."

It is further alleged in said amended complaint that thereafter, and on the 1st day of June, 1926, the defendants, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, entered into a second written agreement whereby Downs and wife agreed to sell, and Ahlborn agreed to buy, the same real property for the sum of $9,500. This latter agreement contained no provision for the payment of any real estate commission, but did contain the following paragraph upon that subject: "It is hereby mutually agreed that any commission which may be claimed by any firm or individual because of the sale of the herein described property is to be paid by the party of the second part and the party of the second part hereby guarantees the parties of the first part against any loss whatsoever through any such claim, deed not to be delivered to the party of the second part until the parties of the first part have been satisfied that no claim for commission will be made."

The amended complaint contains other allegations, but it is not necessary to refer to any of them except those averring that the sum of $500 was the reasonable value of the services rendered by plaintiff in effecting said sale, and that said sum had not been paid. Plaintiff asked for a reformation of the agreement of April 13, 1926, by the insertion of "500" after the dollar sign and the words "F. G. Calhoun" after the word "to" in the last line of said agreement, and for judgment of $500 against the defendants and each of them, together with interest from the date of said agreement. The defendants Downs and wife appeared separately from their codefendant Ahlborn, each filing a general demurrer to the amended complaint. These demurrers were sustained, and the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] The position of the trial court, and that taken by the respondents on this appeal, is that a contract to pay a real estate commission being one which is required under the statute of frauds to be in writing, if it fails to contain all the essential elements of such a contract, cannot be reformed so as to include any of the elements omitted therefrom for by so doing the court makes a new contract for the parties which is not in writing but which is based upon oral evidence. In their briefs, the respondents state that this is a question of first impression in so far as the appellate courts of this state are concerned, and in this statement the appellant agrees. Numerous authorities are cited by the respective parties from other jurisdictions bearing upon this question, from which it appears that the courts of these jurisdictions are not in entire harmony in their decisions as to the power of the courts in this respect.

It will not be necessary for us to review these authorities, for the reason that, since the filing of the briefs of the parties hereto, this court has passed upon practically the identical question and has decided the same adversely to the contention of the respondents. We refer to the case of Oatman v. Niemeyer, 207 Cal. 424, 278 P. 1043. In that case one Garrison had employed the plaintiff to care for him, nurse him, and keep house for him until his death, and in consideration thereof, agreed to give to plaintiff all of his property, both real and personal. Plaintiff performed her part of said agreement, and a few weeks before his death Garrison sent for a justice of the peace and directed him to prepare the necessary papers which would invest the plaintiff with all of his property. Thereupon the justice of the peace prepared a deed, and the same was executed by Garrison and delivered to the plaintiff. Garrison died some two weeks thereafter, and it was then discovered that, although the deed purported to grant to plaintiff "all the certain lot, piece or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the city of Wheatland, County of Yuba, State of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit," no description of the property sought to be conveyed appeared in said deed. An action was brought by the plaintiff against the administrator of the estate of Garrison to reform said deed and to quiet plaintiff's title to a certain tract of land owned by Garrison and situated in said city of Wheatland, and being the only real property owned by him in said city. It was alleged in the complaint in said action, and the trial court so found, that it was the intention of Garrison to convey by said deed said tract of land, but, by the mistake of the person who prepared it, the description of said land was omitted therefrom. The trial court by its judgment reformed the deed and quieted plaintiff's title to said real property. On appeal, this court affirmed said judgment. The case was given most careful and thorough consideration by this court. In its decision in department it held that the deed was void, and that the reformation thereof would amount to the making of a new contract, and is therefore never granted. A petition for a hearing in bank was granted, and, in our opinion, in which all members of the court were in accord, we held that the trial court properly admitted oral evidence of the contract and the description of the property, and rightly granted reformation of the instrument and quieted the grantee's title to the property. We quote from the concluding paragraph of our opinion as follows:

"There can, of course, be no question but that the deed was void in law, that is, that it failed wholly as a conveyance of property, since no property was described. But the contention that, for that reason, it cannot be reformed, fails to distinguish between a contract which is void for some fundamental reason and an instrument or writing which is void because of mistake in its preparation. If the contract itself is void, as, for example, because it is immoral or because the parties have not agreed on all of its terms, and there is, for that reason, no final contract or understanding between them, or, because the contract lacks consideration, reformation is impossible, since there is no valid contract to reform. But this is entirely different from a case where there is a valid contract and the parties have endeavored to put it in writing, and have made a mistake in writing down its terms, or have endeavored in accordance with the contract to execute an instrument, such as a deed, for the purpose of carrying it out and, through mistake in the preparation of the instrument, the document fails, either wholly or partially, to accomplish such purpose. The instrument may be void in such a case because of the mistake, but there is still a valid contract; and, the contract being valid, equity will reform the instrument to make it what it should be, and would have been except for the mistake. There is no making of a new contract in such a case. There is but the making of a new instrument, either to correctly express the contract or to carry it into effect."

We think that case completely answers every argument advanced by the respondents in support of the action of the trial court in sustaining respondents' demurrers to appellant's amended complaint. It must be held to state the law of this state relative to the question of the power of the court to reform instruments like that involved in this action.

[2, 3] The further contention is made by the respondent Ahlborn that, conceding the liability of Downs and wife to the appellant, he (Ahlborn) has not assumed any obligation to pay the appellant any commission. There is no merit, we think, in this contention. In the first place, Ahlborn signed the original contract which provided for the payment of a commission which, if reformed, as we have indicated it may be, would be an obligation of the plaintiff against the three defendants for the payment of a commission. Furthermore, in the second agreement, being the agreement of date June 1, 1926, as we have seen, Ahlborn agreed to pay any commission which might be claimed by any person "because of the sale of the herein described property." It is true that this agreement was not made with the plaintiff. It cannot be said, however, that it was not made for his benefit. If made for his benefit, although he was not a party to the agreement, he may recover thereon. Sherwood & Sherwood v. Gill & Lutz, 36 Cal. App. 707, 173 P. 171. Reading the two contracts, that of April 13, 1926, and that of June 1, 1926, together, with certain allegations of the complaint, it appears that it was at Ahlborn's suggestion that the contract of June 1, 1926, was executed and substituted for the first contract. In this second contract, as we have seen, the purchase price of the property was reduced from $10,000 to $9,500. No agreement to pay a commission was made therein, but, in lieu thereof, was the provision, already referred to, wherein Ahlborn agreed to pay any commission which might be claimed by any person for making said sale. If these averments of the amended complaint should be sustained by competent evidence, we would have no hesitation in holding that a sufficient case had been made out against Ahlborn for the payment of said commission. The amended complaint, therefore, states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, not only against Downs and wife, but also against Ahlborn. The demurrers were therefore improperly sustained.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrers to the amended complaint interposed by the defendants.

SECURITY-FIRST NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES v. LAMB et al.

L. A. 12347.

Supreme Court of California.

March 26, 1931.

1. Mortgages ⚿200(2).

Under mortgage, mortgagee had authority to pay assessment, validity of which was being contested by mortgagor.

> The mortgage provided, among other things, that mortgage was given to secure faithful performance of all covenants, agreements, and conditions set forth; that mortgagor agreed to pay as soon as due all taxes and assessments which might appear, or appeared to be liens, and that, in case taxes and assessments were not paid, "then mortgagee, being hereby made sole judge of legality thereof, may without notice to mortgagor, pay such taxes, assessments or incumbrances."

2. Mortgages ⚷399.

Where mortgagee paid assessments under provisions of mortgage, and mortgagor refused to refund same, he was in default, and mortgagee could foreclose.

3. Mortgages ⚷200(2).

Provision conferring on mortgagee power to determine whether assessments should be paid or contested is not unconscionable or against public policy.

4. Mortgages ⚷200(3).

Mortgagee's payment of assessment being contested by mortgagor was not "voluntary payment" where, if it had not been paid when due, large penalty would have been added.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Action by Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles against Josephine M. Lamb, Ellen Augusta Donovan, and others. From a default judgment, Ellen Augusta Donovan appeals.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a default judgment in a foreclosure action, entered against defendant Ellen Augusta Donovan, after a demurrer to her answer had been sustained, with leave to amend. The facts out of which this controversy arose, as disclosed by the record, are as follows:

On October 3, 1925, Josephine M. Lamb and Ellen Augusta Donovan, joint owners of certain real property, executed their joint promissory note in the sum of $4,000, payable to the plaintiff bank October 3, 1928. This note was secured by the mortgage which is the subject of this action. Subsequently, the plaintiff bank granted an extension until October 3, 1931. Appellant, Augusta Donovan, performed all of the terms and conditions of the mortgage, and paid interest on the note, up to the time this foreclosure action was commenced, with the exception that a certain street assessment levied by the city of Los Angeles was not paid. The ordinance of intention in reference to this assessment was passed by the city council on September 4, 1925, approximately a month before the mortgage involved herein was executed. The city continued proceedings under the Street Opening Act of 1903 (Cal. Stats. 1903, p. 376), condemned certain property necessary for the improvement, and, on June 20, 1928, assessed the property here involved in the sum of $7,500. Defendant Augusta Donovan filed a written protest against the assessment, as required by law, which protest was denied on November 9, 1928. On November 14, 1928, the city slightly lowered the assessment against the property involved herein, making the final assessment the sum of $7,088. On December 31, 1928, defendant Augusta Donovan commenced an action in the superior court, contesting the validity of the entire assessment procedure. On May 17, 1929, the trial court upheld the validity of the assessment. Defendant Augusta Donovan thereupon perfected her appeal from the judgment so entered. This court, on June 11, 1930, upheld the validity of the assessment. Donovan v. City of Los Angeles (Cal. Sup.) 288 P. 1083.

[1] In the meantime, on April 10, 1929 (before the trial court had rendered its decision in the assessment case, and while that action was pending), the plaintiff mortgagee paid to the city of Los Angeles the sum of $7,088 in full satisfaction of the assessment. After having paid the assessment, which it is alleged was a prior lien and a cloud on the title, the mortgagee demanded of the mortgagors the sum of $7,088, which it had advanced to pay the assessment. The mortgagors refused to pay the same, whereupon the mortgagee instituted this foreclosure action, electing to declare the amount of the note and the assessment immediately due and payable, under certain provisions of the mortgage. Defendant Augusta Donovan answered, admitting the execution of the note and mortgage, and the payment of the assessment by the mortgagee, but setting up as a defense that the mortgagee had no authority to pay an assessment, the validity of which was being contested by the mortgagor. Plaintiff bank generally demurred to this defense. The trial court sustained the demurrer with leave to amend. Augusta Donovan refused to amend and elected to stand on her answer. Her default was duly entered, and, from the judgment so secured, she prosecutes this appeal. The main point presented is in reference to the sufficiency of this defense, which depends, of course, on the terms and conditions of the mortgage.

The mortgage here involved contains the usual provisions commonly found in such instruments. Among other things, it provides that the mortgage is given to secure "the faithful performance of all the covenants, agreements and conditions" therein set forth; that the mortgagor "agrees to pay, as soon as due, all taxes, assessments and incumbrances, which may be, or appear to be, liens" against the property, and "to pay and settle promptly (or cause to be removed by suit or otherwise) all adverse claims against said property"; that "in case said taxes, assessments or incumbrances so agreed to be paid by the mortgagor be not so paid * * * then the mortgagee, being hereby made the sole judge of the legality thereof, may, without notice to the mortgagor, pay such taxes, assessments, or encumbrances, * * *" that all sums expended by the mortgagee, "in doing any or all of the things authorized in this mortgage," shall be secured by the mortgage; that the mortgagor promises to pay the note and in case of default in the payment of the same, or "in the performance of any of the covenants or agreements herein contained * * * the whole sum of money then secured by this mortgage shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of said note, and this mortgage may thereupon * * * be foreclosed. * * *" It is then provided that "the mortgagor also hereby mortgages the property * * * to secure every promise and agreement therein contained. * * *" (Italics added.)

When the above provisions are read together, there can be no doubt that the contracting parties clearly provided that the mortgagee rather than the mortgagor should be the one to determine whether to pay the assessment or whether to contest the same. In other words, the mortgage expressly confers on the mortgagee the very power here exercised. The appellant tacitly admits this, but contends that the clause should not be enforced in a situation where the mortgagor is contesting in good faith, the validity of the assessment, for the reason that it is violative of public policy and unconscionable to thus place the mortgagor at the mercy of the mortgagee. It is also contended that the payment of the assessment, under the circumstances here presented, amounted to a voluntary payment, and that the clause italicized above, if enforced, ousts the courts of jurisdiction and is therefore void. All of these contentions are without merit.

In the first place, it is admitted that the assessment involved herein, if valid, would be a prior lien to that of the mortgage, although subsequent in time. Under the terms of the Street Opening Act of 1903, the assessment became due and payable as soon as the assessment was recorded, and became delinquent 30 days after the publication of the notice of recording. If not paid by that time (or allowed to go to bond, which could not be done here, because, under the Bond Act, it is provided that any person desiring the assessment to go to bond must waive all objections to its validity), certain penalties immediately accrued. Respondent bank has computed that, if it had not paid the assessment on April 10, 1929, and had waited until this court passed upon the validity of the assessment, it would have had to pay $10,632, which includes the $7.088 assessment, penalties, and interest. It is obvious, therefore, that the mortgagee had an important interest to protect, and that it would have been injured had it not paid the assessment.

[2, 3] In the second place, it is well settled that, if the mortgagor fails to pay due taxes and assessments, under provisions similar to those set forth above, the mortgagee may pay the same, and add the amount so paid to the mortgage debt, and, if the mortgagor refuses to refund the same, he is in default, and the mortgagee may foreclose. Section 2876, Civ. Code; Windt v. Covert, 152 Cal. 350, 353, 93 P. 67; Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 647, 656, 54 P. 254; Brickell v. Batchelder, 62 Cal. 623, 630; Brichetto v. Raney, 76 Cal. App. 232, 240, 245 P. 235. This is so, even where the validity of the prior lien has not been finally determined. Windt v. Covert, supra; Weinreich v. Hensley, supra; see, also note in L. R. A. 1915D, 432. The only way in which this case differs from the last two cases is that here the mortgagor was directly attacking the validity of the assessment at the time the mortgagee paid it. However, the mortgage expressly conferred on the mortgagee the power to determine whether the assessment should be paid or contested. We can see no reason why such a clause is unconscionable or against public policy, as contended by the appellant. There is no public interest involved. The contract is between the contracting parties and concerns them alone.

[4] It must be kept in mind that, at the very time this mortgage was executed, the ordinance of intention in reference to this improvement had already been passed. It was, therefore, clear to both contracting parties that an assessment would probably be levied against the property, and that one of the contracting parties would have to determine whether the assessment should be paid or contested. The mortgagee, as a condition of making the loan, required that it be given that power. The payment by the mortgagee can in no sense be said to have been a voluntary payment. As already pointed out, not only was the assessment a prior lien, but unless it had been paid at the time it was due, a large penalty would have been added, which would have materially decreased the mortgagee's security. Nor do we perceive in what manner the mortgagor's rights were invaded by such a clause. A remedy was open to her. She could have paid the assessment under protest and then brought an action for its recovery. Spencer v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 103, 179 P. 163.

The other assignments of error are highly technical and are without merit.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SEAWELL, J.

This is a motion to dismiss defendants' appeal taken from an order granting a new trial. Said order was made after entry of a judgment of nonsuit in favor of defendants at the close of plaintiff's opening statement to the jury. Plaintiff contends that said order is nonappealable. Section 963, subdivision 2, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that an appeal may be taken from an order granting a new trial only "in an action or proceeding tried by a jury where such trial by jury is a matter of right." Plaintiff's action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendants, and hence was an action in which she was entitled to trial by jury as a matter of right. Section 592, Code Civ. Proc. Her argument upon this motion to dismiss is that an action or proceeding cannot be said to have been "tried by a jury" where the jury has returned no verdict, but the only determination made in the case is a judgment of nonsuit rendered by the court at the close of plaintiff's opening statement.

Defendants' contention is that an action is "tried by a jury" within the meaning of said section where proceedings are commenced before a jury impaneled and sworn to try the case, although the disposition thereof may involve the granting of a nonsuit or directed verdict because the evidence as a matter of law is insufficient to sustain a judgment for plaintiff, or the granting of a nonsuit upon plaintiff revealing the weakness of his case in his opening statement to the jury. We are of the view that Estate of Baird, 195 Cal. 59, 231 P. 744, 746, relied upon by defendants, sustains their contention. In that case the trial court had submitted issues raised upon a petition for partial distribution to the jury, which had returned a verdict for the petitioner. This court was of the view that the evidence as a matter of law required a decision against petitioner and that it would have been proper for the trial court to have granted a nonsuit or directed verdict against said petitioner. We therefore directed the trial court to enter judgment denying the petition for partial distribution. From the judgment entered in the trial court in pursuance of the order of this court, the trial court granted a new trial. In holding the order granting a new trial appealable this court said:

"Respondents contend that '* * * the proper construction to be placed on section

963, C. C. P., is that what is meant by an action or proceeding tried by a jury is a trial by jury under the direction of the court subject to existing laws, one of which is that the trial court has the power in such a case as this to direct a verdict, and, although the verdict is rendered under the direction of the court, it is nevertheless a proceeding tried by a jury.'

"The petitioner, on the other hand, argues that 'it is perfectly manifest from the statute that what is meant by a trial by jury is that instance in which, a verdict having been rendered in favor of a party and judgment entered thereupon in his favor, and the court below, at the instance of the other party, sets aside that judgment and verdict and grants a new trial, the right of appeal exists in favor of the person in whose favor the verdict was rendered. * * *'

"To give to the provision 'tried by jury' in section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, the interpretation contended for by petitioner would have the effect of giving a narrow and restricted meaning to the language of the section. * * *

"What is meant by section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, is that there cannot be an appeal from an order granting a new trial unless there has been a trial by jury as distinguished from a trial by the court without a jury or in an equity proceeding."

In said case this court repudiates a construction of section 963 which would allow an appeal from an order granting a new trial only where the determination set aside by said order is based upon a jury verdict. That the court would have found the order appealable if the judgment had been entered upon a verdict directed by the trial court rather than by the order of this court, is indicated by the following quotation: "There is no merit in petitioner's contention that even in a case where the verdict is directed by the trial court no appeal can be taken from an order granting a new trial."

[1-3] For the purposes of the problem before us, the same effect must be given a judgment of nonsuit as a judgment entered upon a directed verdict. A judgment upon a directed verdict, no less than a judgment of nonsuit, is the decision of the court rather than of the jury. Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 177 P. 283; Gaskill v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 30 Cal. App. 593, 159 P. 200; Umsted v. Scofield Engineering Cons. Co., 203 Cal. 224, 263 P. 799; Engelberg v. Sebastiani, 207 Cal. 727, 279 P. 795. In interpreting the meaning of section 963 no reasons exist for distinguishing the cases disposed of by the court through the procedure of a directed verdict from those determined by nonsuit. Nor can a distinction be drawn between cases in which the nonsuit is granted upon evidence and those in which it is granted upon the opening statement to the jury.

Plaintiff argues that the Baird Case does not establish the rule to be applied herein for the reason that in the Baird Case the jury had actually returned a verdict upon issues submitted to it, which is not the case where a nonsuit is granted in the trial court. But the verdict of the jury had been overthrown by the order of this court directing judgment to be entered contrary thereto, and the judgment from which a new trial was granted in that case, as in the proceeding now before us, was not entered upon a jury verdict. We are of the view that an action or proceeding is "tried by a jury" within the meaning of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, although in the course of the proceedings before the jury it may become proper for the court to render the judgment in the case.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

PERRY v. McLAUGHLIN et al.

Sac. 4463.

Supreme Court of California.
March 20, 1931.

1. Automobiles 🔑6.

Statute limiting liability of automobile driver and owner for injuries to guest held not applicable to actions for personal injuries pending at its effective date (California Vehicle Act, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

> California Vehicle Act, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580, relieves automobile driver and owner of liability for injuries to guest, except in case of injuries arising from intoxication, willful misconduct, or gross negligence of driver or owner.

2. Appeal and error 🔑204(1).

Competency of evidence admitted without objection in trial court could not be questioned for first time on appeal.

3. Negligence 🔑108(1).

Negligence may be pleaded in general terms.

4. Negligence 🔑108(2).

Complaint is sufficient if it alleges specific acts which constitute negligence complained of.

5. Automobiles 🔑238(5).

Automobile guest's complaint against driver and owner for injuries sustained when guest was thrown from seat to floor of automobile held to state cause of action.

The complaint stated that driver was operating automobile as agent of owner, and that the road over which the automobile was being driven was rough, rugged, bumpy, and jagged, that driver knew condition of road, that the automobile was operated in negligent and careless manner, in that driver operated automobile at excessive speed, and that guest riding in back seat was thrown to floor of automobile injuring her back.

6. Negligence 🔑136(10).

Negligence is for jury, where evidence is such that inferences may be drawn for or against existence thereof.

7. Automobiles 🔑245(24).

Negligence of automobile driver held for jury, where guest had been thrown from back seat to floor of automobile and injured.

The evidence produced by the automobile guest was to the effect that the road at point where accident occurred was rough and full of potholes and ruts, that the culvert where guest was thrown from her seat was in bad shape, and at time of accident automobile was traveling at the rate of thirty or thirty-five miles per hour, and that the driver had been over road on several occasions and knew condition thereof.

8. Trial 🔑235(1).

Instruction that jury could not indulge in speculation, guess, or conjecture as to whether automobile driver's negligence caused injuries to guest, but in such event jury must find for defendants, held properly refused as ambiguous.

9. Automobiles 🔑246(20).

Instruction that, in determining whether automobile driver used due care, as regards injury to guest, and drove automobile at reasonable speed, jury should consider all circumstances influencing conduct of ordinarily prudent driver, held proper.

The instruction was objected to because it omitted all reference to element of knowledge on part of driver as to condition of road, and failed to confine consideration of jury to condition of road as it was known to driver at time of accident.

10. Damages 🔑213.

Instruction existence of disease would not prevent recovery by automobile guest from driver and owner, but recovery could be had for aggravation of disease, held proper.

The evidence disclosed that the guest's injured vertebra had been weakened by disease before accident, but that the accident broke down the diseased vertebra and necessitated an operation, resulting in permanently stiffened back.

11. Damages 🔑159(3).

Under plea of general damages, evidence as to wages and earning capacity prior to personal injuries held admissible.

12. Evidence 🔑151(4).

Testimony of automobile driver that her daughter at church was on her mind held admissible in guest's action for injuries as showing motive for fast driving.

13. Automobiles 🔑243(3).

Admitting evidence that road for quarter of mile in approaching place of accident was rough held admissible, in guest's action for injuries.

14. Evidence 🔑474(8).

Automobile guest suing for injuries held competent to testify as to speed of automobile.

15. Automobiles 🔑244(30).

Proof that wife operated automobile with husband's consent created prima facie case authorizing inference that wife was using automobile as husband's agent.

16. Automobiles 🔑244(30).

Evidence that at time of accident wife was acting as husband's agent in driving automobile held sufficient to sustain judgment against husband, in guest's action for injuries.

The evidence disclosed that the husband had driven automobile to country club and turned automobile over to wife and requested her to call for him later in the day, and that, as wife was returning from country club, automobile guest was thrown from seat to floor of automobile and injured.

17. Damages 🔑132(3).

$12,500 for breaking down of diseased vertebra of woman, forty years of age, before injuries receiving $16 to $18 per week, held not excessive.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal in 287 P. 354.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Butler, Van Dyke & Desmond and Butler, Van Dyke, Desmond & Harris, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

[1] At the time the petition for a transfer of this cause was before this court after decision thereof by the District Court of Appeal, there were under submission to this court one or more cases in which the applicability of section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act, often referred to as the "Guest Law," enacted in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 1580), to cases of the character of the instant case was under consideration. Said section in effect provides that a guest in a vehicle may not recover for personal injuries, based upon ordinary negligence of the driver of said vehicle, and in the cases mentioned, as well as in the present action, counsel contended that said section of the California Vehicle Act was retroactive in its scope and applied to all cases pending at the time of its enactment, wherein the judgments had not become final. For this reason the petition for a transfer was granted. Since then it has been definitely established by the decisions of this court, and particularly by that rendered in the case of Callet v. Alioto, 290 P. 438, that said section of the California Vehicle Act does not apply to or in any way affect actions for damages for personal injuries pending at its effective date.

As the decision of the District Court of Appeal in this action is in harmony with the recent decisions of this court on that subject, we hereby adopt the same as the opinion of this court. The original opinion of the District Court of Appeal was written by Hon. F. M. Jamison, sitting as a justice pro tempore, and is as follows:

"This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondent, upon a verdict of a jury in an action for damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by respondent while riding as a guest of appellants in an automobile owned by appellant Porter McLaughlin, and operated by appellant, Pauline McLaughlin, at the time of the accident that caused the injuries. Also, an appeal from the orders of the court denying motions of appellants for a new trial, and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

[2] "Appellants are husband and wife, and were such on the 15th day of May, 1927. On that day appellant Pauline McLaughlin invited respondent to attend at the St. Francis church, in the city of Sacramento, to witness the ceremony of the first communion of appellants' eldest daughter. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the daughter not being ready to leave the church, appellant Porter McLaughlin wished to drive out to the Del Paso Country Club and invited respondent to accompany himself and wife in his automobile. Respondent accepted the invitation and got in the automobile. Upon arriving at the country club appellant Porter McLaughlin got out of the automobile, turned the wheel over to his wife, and requested her to call for him later in the day. Appellant Pauline McLaughlin then started to drive back to the said church where she had left her daughter, returning over the same road which they had just traversed in going to said country club. Respondent was in the back seat of the automobile, which was a Packard sedan, and with her in the back seat were the younger daughter of appellants' and their Japanese cook, respondent being seated on the left-hand side of said automobile, the daughter next to her and the cook on the right-hand side and appellant Pauline McLaughlin being alone in the front seat. At a point about one-quarter of a mile from said club, and near a bridge or culvert which crosses the road at that point, respondent was thrown from her seat with force sufficient to fracture or break the eleventh vertebra of her spine. The evidence produced upon the part of the respondent tended to prove that the road at the point where the accident happened was a dirt road, was rough and full of potholes and ruts, and that the said bridge or culvert was in bad condition, and the approach to it was full of ruts and potholes, with a sway in the road near the said bridge or culvert, and that at the time of the accident appellant Pauline McLaughlin was driving the automobile at the rate of from thirty to thirty-five miles per hour; that the automobile swayed back and forth across the road before the final bump or shock that threw respondent from her seat. Appellant Pauline McLaughlin denied that she was driving said automobile, at the time of the accident, in excess of twenty or twenty-five miles per hour, and denied that the front part of said automobile swayed or swerved at all. She further testified that she was under the impression that the rear wheel of her automobile went into a rut which caused the jolt that threw respondent from her seat. The principal witness produced by respondent to prove the condition of the road at the point where the accident happened was

A. H. Becker, who testified that for the past five or six years he had been in the habit of passing over what he called the back road from Sacramento to the said club, twice a week, and did so in May, 1927; that from the club to the culvert or bridge, being approximately a quarter of a mile, the road was always rough, full of potholes, and that the approach to the culvert was in bad shape, that is, was rough, full of ruts and potholes, with a sway before hitting the culvert. Appellants raise the point in their brief that the testimony of Becker should not be considered for the reason that the road, regarding which he testified, was not identified as being the identical road upon which the accident happened. Appellants made no cross-examination of this witness, except to ask him a few formal questions; made no objection before the trial court to this testimony upon the ground that the road about which the witness testified was not the road upon which the accident happened; nor moved to have the same stricken on that ground. Even though this testimony was incompetent, still, being admitted without objection, and treated by the parties as competent in the trial court, the question of its competency cannot be raised in the appellate court. Curiac v. Packard et al., 29 Cal. 194; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 461, 168 P. 1036; Parsons v. Easton, 184 Cal. 764, 195 P. 419. However, all of the witnesses agree that the road upon which the accident happened was a dirt road leading from the city of Sacramento to the Del Paso Country Club, several of them, testifying that this dirt road connects Eighth street with the road upon which the club is situated. It is admitted that the accident happened on the dirt road at the culvert about a quarter of a mile from the club. Becker testified that in going to the club from Sacramento he went out Eighth street, and then went over a back road leading from Eighth street and turning to the left to the club; that this was a dirt road, and that about a quarter of a mile from the club there was a bridge or culvert across the road. We are of the opinion that, in any event, there was evidence from which the jury might fairly deduce the inference that the road about which the witness Becker testified was the road upon which the accident happened.

[3-5] "The first ground for reversal put forward by appellants is that the third amended complaint fails to state a cause of action. Said complaint, after stating that appellants were husband and wife, sets forth that appellant Porter McLaughlin was the owner of the automobile, and that at the time of the accident respondent was riding therein as a guest of appellants, and that appellant was driving and operating the said automobile as the agent of said Porter McLaughlin, and under his authorization and direction, and that the road over which the automobile was being driven was a dirt road and was rough, rugged, bumpy, and jagged, and that said appellant Pauline McLaughlin had operated said automobile over said road prior to said accident on other occasions, and knew the said road to be in said condition, and further stated 'that the said Pauline McLaughlin did on the said 15th day of May, 1927, and at that time on said day when plaintiff herein was accompanying said defendant in said Packard automobile, drive and operate said Packard automobile along and upon said dirt road in a reckless, negligent and careless manner, in that said defendant did drive and operate said automobile at so great a rate of speed, and with such disregard to the said condition of said road as to cause the automobile, by reason of said excessive speed, combined with the condition of said road, to suddenly swerve across said road and rebound onto said road with great force, thereby causing plaintiff, who was then and there riding in the back seat of said automobile, to be thrown and hurled with great force and violence to the floor of said automobile and that plaintiff was then and there injured,' etc. While it is sufficient to plead negligence in general terms (Dewhirst v. Leopold, 194 Cal. 424, 229 P. 30; Mathes v. Aggeler & Musser Seed Co., 179 Cal. 697, 178 P. 713), a complaint is sufficient if it alleges the specific acts which constitute the negligence complained of. Cal. Jur., vol. 19, p. 674.

"We are of the opinion that the complaint stated a cause of action and that the demurrer was properly overruled. Furthermore, appellants answered and went to trial upon the issues thus formed, and there is nothing to indicate that they were misled in any way as to the issues they were to meet, and in fact did meet as best they could, and the cause appears to have been fairly tried upon the merits. Irrgang v. Ott, 9 Cal. App. 440, 99 P. 528.

[6, 7] "The next contention of appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict because it fails to show any negligent act or omission of appellant Pauline McLaughlin which proximately caused injury to respondent. The evidence produced by respondent was to the effect that the road, at the point where the accident occurred, was a dirt road, very rough, and full of potholes and ruts, and that the bridge or culvert, at the point where respondent was thrown from her seat, was in bad shape, and the approach to the said bridge or culvert was also in bad condition, and that at the time of the accident the automobile was traveling at the rate of thirty or thirty-five miles per hour; that appellant Pauline McLaughlin had driven over the said road on two different occasions before the accident, and had been seated in the front seat with her husband when he had driven the automobile over this road in going to the said club the day of the accident. She testified that the road where the accident happened was rough; that the earth was worn away from the ends of the planks on the bridge; that she thought there were ruts in the road, although she did not get out to examine them. She further testified that the accident happened at the edge of the bridge or culvert just before she went over it, as she had passed over the bridge when she stopped the automobile, and that at the time of the accident she was traveling at the rate of twenty or twenty-five miles per hour. Respondent testified that at first the car zigzagged, then it turned to the right a little bit, then to the left, then it hit a bump and threw the small daughter of appellants between her and the front seat; that she grabbed the little girl and just then the car swung around to the right and she was thrown between the seat and the door and struck her back against something. Where the evidence is such that inferences may be drawn for or against a conclusion of negligence, it is for the jury to determine whether or not negligence existed. 19 Cal. Jur., p. 723. In the case of Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 239 P. 709, 713, 41 A. L. R. 1027, the court said: 'The rule by which appellate courts must be guided in passing upon the question whether findings of fact or verdicts of juries are sufficiently supported by the evidence is this: "That where an honest difference of opinion between men of average intelligence can arise as to the effect of the evidence—that is, if the evidence is such as that different conclusions upon the matter can rationally be drawn [from the evidence]—then the case presented is one for the jury, or the court, if the questions of fact be submitted to its arbitrament." ' So in the instant case, if the jury believed that the testimony produced by respondent and her witnesses was true, that is to say, that at the place where the accident occurred the road was a dirt road, that it was rough and full of ruts and potholes, and that the approach to the bridge, near where respondent was injured, was in bad condition, that appellant had been over this road previously on several occasions, and knew that the road was rough and in bad condition, and with this knowledge she drove the automobile in which respondent was riding as a guest, over this road at the point where the accident happened, at an excessive rate of speed, taking into consideration, on the question of speed, the condition of the road at that point, and thereby produced such jolting and swerving of the automobile that respondent was thrown and cast from her seat and injured, there was certainly evidence sufficient upon which to base their verdict that appellant Pauline McLaughlin was guilty of negligence and that this negligence was the proximate cause of respondent's injuries. Upon that state of facts the said last-named appellant would have been acting in violation of section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553), which, among other things, provides that no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle on a public highway at such rate of speed as to endanger the life or limb of any person.

[8] "The next ground for reversal urged by appellants is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in giving instructions and in modifying and refusing proposed instructions. The instructions in this case are not numbered; we cannot, therefore, refer to them by numbers, which is to be regretted. One of the proposed instructions on behalf of appellants, which was refused by the court, is as follows:

" 'You cannot speculate or guess that caused the alleged accident. In case the evidence should show that the alleged injury to plaintiff may have occurred as a result of negligence of defendants, or may have occurred without any negligence on the part of defendants, you cannot indulge in speculation, guess or conjecture as to whether negligence on the part of defendants may have caused the injury but in such event you must return a verdict for defendants and against plaintiff.'

"Presumably, it was the intention, by this instruction, to inform the jury that mere speculation, guess, or conjecture that defendants were guilty of negligence would not justify the jury in finding that defendants, or either of them, were guilty of negligence. If this was the intention of appellants, then, in substance, it was covered by the instruction given by the court, and found on pages 137 and 138 of the reporter's transcript, wherein the court instructed the jury that mere supposition or surmise that negligence on the part of defendant Pauline McLaughlin proximately caused the alleged accident would not justify a verdict against defendants, or either of them.

"The court refused the above quoted instruction on the ground that it was ambiguous, and in the ruling we think the court was right.

[9] "Appellants object to the instruction on page 161 of the reporter's transcript. In this instruction the court told the jury that, in determining whether or not defendant Pauline McLaughlin used due care and prudence and circumspection, and drove her car at a reasonable and prudent speed, it was the duty of the jury to take into consideration all the circumstances then and there existing which would have influenced the conduct of an ordinarily prudent driver in the same situation. Appellants claim that this instruction is objectionable, because it omits all reference to the element of knowledge or notice on the part of Pauline McLaughlin, and fails to confine the consideration of the jury to the condition of the road as it was known to her at the time of the accident. It is true that the instruction did not contain the words 'at the time and place of the accident,' but it is evident that the jury could not have been misled by this omission. As applied to the facts in this case, the instruction unquestionably is a correct statement of the law. Furthermore, in its instructions on pages 126–127 of the reporter's transcript, the court fully instructed the jury upon the matter of the knowledge or notice of Pauline McLaughlin regarding the condition of the road at the place of the accident. Taking the instructions as a whole they fully and fairly presented to the jury, for its determination, whether or not, under the facts of this case, the said Pauline McLaughlin was or was not guilty of negligence.

[10] "Appellants also take exception to the instruction of the court set forth on page 162 of the reporter's transcript, claiming that there was no evidence upon which it could be supported. This instruction, in substance, is to the effect that the existence of disease does not prevent recovery, but, on the contrary, recovery may be had for the increase or aggravation of same. The testimony of all the experts is that the eleventh vertebra had been weakened by disease, presumably tuberculosis; that the accident broke down this diseased vertebra and necessitated an operation by means of which the vertebral column was in a manner united and again supported, but at the expense of a permanently stiffened back, and the necessity for respondent having to wear a steel jacket. There is no evidence that, except for this accident, this defective vertebra would not have continued to support the vertebral column. Even though the ravages of the disease had been stayed or stopped prior to the accident, yet, according to the testimony of the experts, this vertebra was left, by virtue of said disease, in a defective condition, so much so, indeed, that the shock given to it at the time of the accident broke it down and rendered it wholly useless as a means of support to the remainder of the vertebral column. No error was committed in giving this instruction. Campbell v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 565, 70 P. 624; White v. Red Mountain Fruit Co., 186 Cal. 335, 199 P. 318.

[11] "The objection of appellants to the instruction given on pages 165–166 of the reporter's transcript is without merit. The part objected to is to the effect that, if the jury finds the issues in favor of respondent, then in estimating her damage they must take into consideration the condition of her health and physical ability before the accident, the nature and extent of her injuries, etc. The testimony of respondent was that before the accident she worked for the Almond Growers' Association as an almond grader, and prior to that work she had done laundry work; that since her injury she had not been able to perform manual labor of any kind; has been compelled to keep a servant to do her house work. She further testified that she had worked for the Almond Growers' Association up to within a month prior to the accident, and that her wages were $16 to $18 per week. Appellants claim that the admission of this testimony was erroneous for the reason that no claim had been made by respondent for special damages of this character. There was no error committed by the court in the admission of this testimony. Under the plea of general damages, and to prove loss of earning capacity, it is permissible to show what wages, salary, or emolument respondent was earning and capable of earning prior to the injury. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513; Ehat v. Scheidt, 17 Cal. App. 430, 120 P. 49, 50. In this last case, Hart, J. said: 'The earning capacity of the plaintiff prior to receiving the injuries complained of in the business which he had customarily followed was a proper element to be considered in the assessment of damages.'

[12] "On cross-examination Pauline McLaughlin was permitted by the court, over objection, to testify that when she left the country club she intended to drive back to get her daughter, and, in reply to questions as to whether she was anxious to get back to the church on account of her daughter, and for the reason was hurrying her return, she said that she did not think she was specially hurrying, but that her daughter at the church was on her mind. The admission of this evidence is assigned as error. Inasmuch as this witness had testified that she was driving the automobile at only a moderate rate of speed on her return from the country club to the place of the accident, and by that evidence seeking to controvert the evidence of respondent that she was driving at a speed of thirty or thirty-five miles per hour, the fact, if proven, that she had a motive for hurrying back to the church, or was hurrying back at the time of the accident, would have some evidentiary force as tending to contradict her statement that she was not traveling at the rate of thirty or thirty-five miles per hour, as testified to by respondent. For that purpose this evidence was admissible.

[13, 14] "Error is also claimed by appellants in the ruling of the court permitting testimony to be given to the effect that from the Country Club road to the place of the accident, a distance of about a quarter of a mile, the road was rough, bumpy, and full of potholes. It is urged by appellants that testimony as to the character of the road upon which the accident occurred should be limited to the place of the accident. While as a general rule this is true, yet, as tending to show notice to, and knowledge upon the part of, Pauline McLaughlin, of the nature and condition of the surface of the road over which she was traveling just prior to the accident, it was permissible to show that for at least a reasonable distance in approaching the place where the accident happened, and continuing to that place, the road was rough and in bad condition. Under the circumstances surrounding this accident, and as tending to prove that Pauline McLaughlin did know, or, in the exercise of her judgment as a reasonable person, should have known that the road, at the place of the accident, was rough and in bad condition, we are of the opinion that the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence. Nor did the court err in permitting respondent to testify as to the speed at which the automobile was traveling. She being a person of at least ordinary intelligence, so far as the evidence shows, and having opportunity for observing the said speed, was competent to testify to same. Shimoda v. Bundy, 24 Cal. App. 675, 142 P. 109; Johnsen v. Oakland, S. L. & H. E. Ry., 127 Cal. 608, 60 P. 170; Snyder v. Reeg, 86 Cal. App. 231, 260 P. 600.

[15, 16] "Appellants further contend that the verdict and judgment against Porter McLaughlin is not supported by any sufficient evidence that at the time of the accident Pauline McLaughlin was acting as his agent in driving the said automobile. Porter McLaughlin himself testified that he was the owner of the automobile; that he personally invited respondent to ride out to the country club with himself and wife; he also testified that he heard his wife invite respondent to ride with them, and heard his wife say she would bring respondent back. Upon arriving at the country club he turned over to his wife the control and operation of the car, knowing that his wife intended to immediately return to the said church with respondent. Where proof is made that the car in question was owned by the husband, and was being operated by the wife at the time of the accident, with his express consent and permission, there is created a prima facie case authorizing an inference by a court or jury, in the absence of substantial proof to the contrary, that the wife was using the car as the agent of the husband. McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 288, 170 P. 417; Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 P. 358; Perry v. A. Paladini, Inc., 89 Cal. App. 275, 264 P. 580; Ransford v. Ainsworth, 196 Cal. 279, 237 P. 747. Appellants offered no evidence in any way controverting the inference or presumption thus created. In addition to the aforesaid presumption arising from ownership of the automobile, there was evidence from which the jury could draw the inference that at the time of the accident Pauline McLaughlin was acting as the agent of her said husband.

[17] "And, lastly, appellants contend that the verdict awarding respondent the sum of $12,500 as general damages, is excessive. At the date of the accident respondent was about forty years of age. Previous to that date she had been troubled with what her physicians termed 'smouldering tuberculosis,' but prior to the accident had been cured of this disease and had been employed as an almond assorter at wages ranging from $16 to $18 per week. Her expectation of life was stipulated to be 28.18 years. The injury inflicted upon her by the accident necessitated a very painful operation which kept her in the hospital for over three months, and thereafter she was confined to her bed in her home for another month, and was not able to get out of the house until in March, 1928, a period of some ten months after the injury. Dr. Harris, one of the physicians who treated respondent, testified that she will always have to wear a steel brace or jacket for her back, and, speaking of her future disability growing out of said injury and the operation, that she would never be able to do housework or hard work of any kind, and that for relief from continuing pain she will require future treatment. There is ample evidence that she has suffered great physical pain, and she will continue to suffer pain in the future.

"Upon this state of the evidence, we are unable to say, using the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Kelley v. Hodge Transportation System, 197 Cal. 598, 242 P. 76, 81, 'that the award of damages made by the jury and sustained by the trial court were grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as presented to us on appeal as to shock the sense of justice and raise at once a presumption that it was the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than an honest and sober judgment.' And this being the case, this court cannot exercise the power of revision. Darling v. Pacific Electric Co., 197 Cal. 702, 242 P. 703; Driscoll v. California Street R. R. Co., 80 Cal. App.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict are affirmed.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing April 23, 1931.

1. Criminal law 🔑829(1).

Refusal of instructions included in charge as given was not error.

2. Criminal law 🔑729.

District attorney's argument respecting life sentence and common knowledge that defendant would be out again held not prejudicial, he substituting "would" for "could."

> Prosecuting officer, after objection to remark and on inquiry by court, explained that he meant "could be" and not "would be" out again, whereupon the court, after objections and assignment of misconduct had been made, said "Proceed."

3. Criminal law 🔑304(2).

It is common knowledge that a parole may be granted to defendant serving term of life imprisonment.

4. Homicide 🔑313(3).

Verdict of first-degree murder was not defective for failure to specify punishment (Pen. Code, § 190).

> Pen. Code, § 190, does not require a jury to specify the death penalty in their verdict, but where the crime of murder in the first degree is found, without recommendation as to punishment, the law imposes the death penalty.

5. Witnesses 🔑337(5).

Requiring defendant taking stand in murder prosecution to answer questions respecting previous conviction for felony held not erroneous (Pen. Code, § 1025; Code Civ. Proc. § 2051).

> Defendant having voluntarily offered himself as a witness was subject on cross-examination to the usual rules for testing his credibility by impeachment, and in particular became subject to the provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, to effect that a witness may be impeached by evidence that his general reputation for truth is bad, but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by examination of witness that he had been convicted of a felony.

PRESTON, J.

On June 9, 1930, the Alameda county grand jury returned an indictment charging defendant with the murder of one, Marcello La Gorio and also with a prior conviction of a felony, to wit, burglary. Upon trial of the cause, the jury returned a verdict finding defendant guilty of murder of the first degree without recommendation of life imprisonment. Judgment carrying the death penalty was thereafter pronounced upon him, and from said judgment and the order denying his motion for new trial, he now prosecutes this appeal.

The case is admittedly a clear one. On the night of May 28, 1930, defendant entered the grocery store of said La Gorio at 5932 San Pablo avenue, Oakland, with the intention of committing a robbery. He pointed a revolver at La Gorio and told him to "stick them up," and, as La Gorio turned, told him to "hurry up," drawing back the hammer of the revolver to make La Gorio move faster. Defendant told the police inspector that he had his thumb on the hammer and that the hammer slipped, accidently discharging the gun, and La Gorio fell to the floor, where he was found by his family. Two days later he passed away from the effects of the wound. On June 4th, defendant was apprehended and charged as above set forth. He admitted having committed approximately fifteen other specified robberies between April 29th and June 1, 1930; that he was armed on all these occasions, but that he had never attempted to shoot any person, even when resistance was offered, which statement was found by a police officer to be true. He testified that his gun and ammunition had been furnished him by a confederate who was waiting in an automobile at the time La Gorio was shot. When arrested defendant was armed with two loaded revolvers, from one of which had been fired the bullet that killed La Gorio.

Counsel in effect admit, as they must, that defendant is guilty of first-degree murder and direct their entire efforts towards having the punishment reduced. In this behalf they make the following contentions: Failure to give certain instructions requested by defendant and misconduct on the part of the district attorney, not admonished by the court, occurring during the trial and argument. Amici curiæ have also filed briefs for appellant wherein they urge the additional points that the verdict failed to specify the punishment as provided in section 190 of the Penal Code, and that error was committed in asking appellant to answer incriminating questions in violation of the provisions of section 13, article 1, of the state Constitution and section 1025 of the Penal Code. These points may be disposed of briefly, as they are all without merit.

[1] We have studied carefully the requested instructions submitted by the appellant and also the entire charge of the court. The substance of each and every one of said requested instructions was included in the charge, and the jury were completely and properly instructed in all matters necessary to a proper determination of the cause.

[2, 3] The misconduct assigned against the district attorney is that in the course of his argument he stated: "Apparently he would want you to turn this man to the penitentiary under a life sentence when it is common knowledge that he would be out on the streets again, * * *" and when objection was made to the remark and others of like character the court failed and refused to admonish the jury to disregard them. The prosecuting officer, on inquiry by the court, explained that he meant "could be" and not "would be" "out again," whereupon the court, after objections and an assignment of misconduct had been made, said "Proceed." We are unable to say that this matter constituted reversible error, for it is a matter of common knowledge that a parole may be granted to a defendant serving a term of life imprisonment. Expressions of this kind by overzealous prosecuting officers, should, however, be avoided, for they are unnecessary and under a different state of facts might be serious error. People v. Reilly, 208 Cal. 385, 387, 281 P. 606; People v. Rowland, 207 Cal. 312, 277 P. 1041.

[4] With reference to the contention of amici curiæ, we may only say in passing that it is well settled that section 190 of the Penal Code does not require a jury to specify the death penalty in their verdict, but, where the crime of murder in the first degree is found, without recommendation as to punishment, the law imposes the death penalty. People v. Hall, 199 Cal. 451, 455, 249 P. 859. We are not disposed to overrule the case of People v. Welch, 49 Cal. 174, and like cases to this effect.

[5] Appellant took the witness stand; he did not testify as to the circumstances of the murder, but did give evidence on some collateral matters. The alleged incriminating questions asked him, of which amici curiæ complain, were whether he had ever been convicted of a felony, answered in the affirmative; then "What felony?" and other questions along the same line. Had these questions been asked for other than purposes of impeachment, the provisions of section 1025 of the Penal Code would be applicable; appellant, however, having voluntarily offered himself as a witness, was subject, upon cross-examination, to the usual rules for testing his credibility by impeachment, and in particular became subject to the provision of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that a witness may be impeached "by evidence that his general reputation for truth * * * is bad, but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by the examination of the witness * * * that he had been convicted of a felony."

We do not deem it necessary to prolong this discussion, as abundant authority exists to support the views above set forth, and the plain and inescapable conclusion is that this record is singularly free from material error of any character.

The judgment is affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.
March 20, 1931.

1. Executors and administrators ⚷221(4).

That claimant was in possession of instrument after maker's death directing executor to pay claimant $5,000 for realty constituted prima facie proof that claimant was owner thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 11).

2. Executors and administrators ⚷221(1).

Presumption, created by claimant's possession, after maker's death, of instrument directing maker's executor to pay claimant $5,000 for realty, supported finding of delivery (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 11).

3. Witnesses ⚷168.

Claimant could testify that on date of maker's death he was in possession of instrument directing executor to pay claimant $5,000 for realty (Code Civ. Proc. § 1880).

The claimant could so testify, since there was nothing to show that the evidence referred to anything other than after maker's death and the inhibition of Code Civ. Proc. § 1880 is only against the claimant testifying to matters that occurred prior to the death of the maker.

4. Executors and administrators ⚷221(1).

Presumption that claimant was owner of instrument directing maker's executor to pay claimant for realty entitled claimant to recover, in absence of evidence that the reconveyance of the realty to claimant had discharged the obligation (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 11).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carl A. Stutsman, Judge.

Action by Cecil E. Reynolds against George W. Dryer, as executor of the last will and testament of Elizabeth Marion Steele Wall, also known as Elizabeth Marion Steele Hallenbeck, etc., deceased. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dryer, Castle, McConlogue & Richards, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fredericks, Hanna & Morton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the respondent on a claim against the decedent's estate, which claim was based upon a document (Plaintiff's Exhibit 1), in words and figures as follows:

"In event of my death I direct my executor Philip Goodell of Montclair, New Jersey, to pay to Cecil E. Reynolds the sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000.00) in consideration of the transfer to me of lots 492 & 493 in tract 1719 as per map recorded in Book 21 P 162–163 Records of Los Angeles County, California.

"Marion Steele Hallenbeck.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 27th day of June—1917. [Seal] Claire Lehman, Notary Public in and for the County of Los Angeles, State of California."

The record discloses that conveyance was made of the real property to decedent, such conveyance having been duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded on the same day, June 27, 1917. On August 10, 1917, the decedent signed and acknowledged a deed which recited a consideration of $10, transferring said property to the respondent. This deed was not recorded until July 21, 1921. On September 27, 1919, Marion Steele Hallenbeck and respondent were married; on March 30, 1921, decedent filed an action for divorce against respondent; and on September 19, 1921, an interlocutory decree was entered in said action. On October 10, 1927, Marion Steele Hallenbeck died.

Appellant relies upon three points on this appeal: First, insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding of the delivery of Plaintiff's Exhibit 1. Second, that the finding that the allegations of appellant's second to tenth separate defenses are untrue is against the evidence. Third, that the court erred in permitting respondent to testify that the instrument was in his possession on the date of decedent's death.

[1, 2] The fact that the written instrument, Plaintiff's Exhibit 1, was in the possession of respondent after the death of the maker of the instrument, was sufficient to constitute proof, prima facie, that respondent was the owner thereof. A disputable presumption is a presumption which "may be controverted by other evidence." One of these is: "That things which a person possesses are owned by him." Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, subd. 11. The respondent did not occupy any position of trust, such as that of an executor, which might create an exception in the application of the presumption relied upon here.

As to point 2, there was sufficient evidence to support the said findings.

[3] As to the third point, that the court erred in permitting respondent to testify that the instrument was in his possession on the date of decedent's death, there is nothing to show that this evidence referred to anything other than after the decedent's death. The inhibition (Code Civ. Proc., § 1880) is only against the claimant testifying to matters of fact that occurred prior to the death of the decedent, and it does not appear that this evidence refers to any time prior to the death of the decedent.

[4] Much of the argument of the appellant is that the respondent failed to put in evidence certain things which he was precluded by law from testifying to himself. When the document, Plaintiff's Exhibit 1, was filed and it was shown that this document was in the possession of the claimant and was actually produced by him, it was presumed to be owned by him (in the absence of any evidence to the contrary), and it would have taken some evidence to prove that the conveyance by decedent to respondent of the real property, referred to herein, and its acceptance by him, was a discharge of this written obligation.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LONG et ux. v. LESTER et al.

Civ. 332.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 16, 1931.

Appeal and error ⚷103.

Orders refusing to vacate order striking out portions of answer and denying motion to file amended answer held not appealable (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Long and wife against H. D. Lester and wife. From orders striking out portions of an answer, refusing to vacate such order, and denying motion to file amended answer, defendants appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

C. W. Braswell, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Jas. R. McBride, of Lindsay, and Power, McFadzean & Crowe, of Visalia, for respondents.

MARKS, J.

In the court below respondents made a motion to strike out certain portions of an answer filed by appellants, which motion was granted. Appellants made a motion to vacate and set aside the foregoing order and another motion for an order giving them leave to file an amended answer. Both of the latter motions were denied. They have filed a notice of appeal in which they attempt to appeal from the foregoing orders. No judgment has been rendered in the court below.

Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides when an appeal may be taken. By the terms of this section, no right of appeal is given from orders such as those of which appellants complain. These orders are not appealable. California Portland Cement Co. v. Boone, 181 Cal. 35, 183 P. 447; Cleland v. Walbridge, 78 Cal. 358, 20 P. 730; Tedford v. San Diego, etc., Co., 79 Cal. App. 505, 249 P. 1093; Cuddahy v. Gragg, 46 Cal. App. 578, 189 P. 721. "An attempt to appeal from a nonappealable order does not give this court jurisdiction or authority to review it." Sherman v. Standard Mines Co., 166 Cal. 524, 137 P. 249.

It is ordered that the proceedings in this court be dismissed.

TOTH v. METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO.

Civ. 373.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 27, 1931.

Appeal and error ⚷773(2).

Good-faith appeal will not be dismissed for slight delay in filing points and authorities on motion presented after appellant filed brief (Code Civ. Proc. § 1013; District Court of Appeal Rule 5).

District Court of Appeal Rule 5 provides that if transcript or points and authorities, though not filed within time prescribed, be on file when notice of motion to dismiss appeal is given, such facts shall be sufficient answer to motion.

Appeal from a judgment of the Superior Court of Kern County, Erwin W. Owen, Judge. Motion denied.

Action by Hazel Toth against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal.

Motion denied.

Knight, Boland & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Rowen Irwin, J. O. Reavis, and R. W. Henderson, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

JENNINGS, J.

Motion by respondent to dismiss an appeal. The motion is based on the ground that the appellant did not file its points and authorities within the time prescribed by the provisions of section 4 of rule I of the rules of this court. The transcript was filed on February 2, 1931. The time for appellant to file its opening brief expired, therefore, on March 4, 1931. Notice of the presentation of this motion was given by mail. The affidavit of mailing shows that a copy of the notice of motion, properly addressed to counsel for appellant, was deposited in the United States Post Office at Bakersfield, Cal., on March 5, 1931. The notice of motion was filed in the office of the clerk of this court on March 5, 1931. An affidavit filed by counsel for appellant shows that appellant's opening brief, addressed to the clerk of this court, was deposited in the United States mail at San Francisco, Cal., on March 5, 1931. Appellant's opening brief was filed in this court on March 6, 1931. The motion to dismiss the appeal herein was noticed for presentation on March 24, 1931, and was presented on that day.

In support of their contention that the appeal herein should be dismissed, counsel for respondent rely upon rule V of the rules of this court, wherein it is provided that if the transcript of the record or appellant's points and authorities be not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may be dismissed, upon notice given, either on motion of the respondent or of the court in which the appeal is pending. It is contended that notice of the motion to dismiss the appeal was given by depositing a copy of the notice of motion, properly addressed, in the United States mail at Bakersfield, Cal., on March 5, 1931, and that on that date the service of the motion to dismiss the appeal was complete. Section 1013, Code Civ. Proc.

Rule V of the rules of this court provides as follows: "If the transcript, or the points and authorities, though not filed within the time prescribed, be on file at the time such notice is given, that fact shall be sufficient answer to the motion." In Jacques v. Board of Supervisors, 22 Cal. App. 627, 135 P. 686, 688, the court used the following language: "Besides, although the language of rule 5 is that if the transcript, not having been filed within the time prescribed, 'be on file at the time the notice is given, that fact shall be a sufficient answer to the motion,' it has been held that if the transcript, properly authenticated by the clerk of the superior court, has been filed prior to the hearing of the motion, the ground for the motion has thereby been removed. In re Ryer, 110 Cal. 560, 42 P. 1082; Woodside v. Hewel, 107 Cal. 141, 40 P. 103; Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 P. 986; Poole v. Grand Circle, Women of Woodcraft, 17 Cal. App. 229, 119 P. 201."

Furthermore, the affidavit of counsel for appellant shows that the appeal has been taken and is presented in good faith and it is obvious that the slight delay complained of has not appreciably postponed the hearing of the appeal on its merits. Tyner v. Axt (Cal. App.) 295 P. 97; Fishman v. Silva (Cal. App.) 291 P. 430; Righetti v. Monroe, etc., Inc. (Cal. App.) 289 P. 650.

The motion to dismiss the appeal herein is denied.

DALLAS v. CHURCH, Superior Judge.

Civ. 7884.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 19, 1931.

Executors and administrators ⚷22(1).

Superior court had jurisdiction to hear and determine application for appointment of special administrator.

Petition by Robert L. Dallas for writ of prohibition to be directed to Lincoln S. Church, Judge of the Superior Court, in and for the County of Alameda.

Writ denied.

Superseding 296 P. 622.

H. H. McPike, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

E. J. Talbott and W. H. Metson, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Petition for writ of prohibition.

It appears therefrom that Mary Hickman died on March 3, 1930. Thereafter an instrument in writing, purporting to be her last will and testament, was filed by A. B. Costigan, one of the executors thereof. Costigan subsequently applied to be appointed special administrator of said estate. One Robert L. Dallas filed his answer to said petition and prayed that the petition be denied, and that special letters upon said estate be issued to him. In his answer Dallas alleged that he was an heir at law of the deceased. Further answering, he alleged that the instrument filed by Costigan as the last will and testament was not her last will, as the testatrix by an instrument in writing other than a will, but executed with all the formalities thereof, which instrument was entirely written, dated, and signed in the handwriting of Mary Hickman, revoked all wills made by her. This revocation was executed subsequent to the making of the will in question. It is alleged in the petition that the court, after a hearing, has expressed the opinion that the petition of the executor to be appointed special administrator should be granted. The filing of the instant petition followed. The court has beyond question jurisdiction to hear and determine the application in question. Having jurisdiction it has the power to decide it correctly or incorrectly. Dalgren v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 622, 97 P. 681.

The petition is denied.

BRUNE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

Civ. No. 7851.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 25, 1931.

1. Certiorari 🔑64(2).

On certiorari to annul order of Superior Court, appellate court is limited to consideration of whether Superior Court exceeded its jurisdiction.

> Under foregoing rule, even though it appear that, during hearing or in the determination of the matter before it, the trial court may have erred to the prejudice of the petitioner, either in matters of fact or matters of law, relief may not be afforded through the medium of a writ of review.

2. Certiorari 🔑64(2).

Record on certiorari to annul order of Superior Court adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt for failure to pay alimony held to show complete jurisdiction over parties and subject-matter, warranting discharge of writ.

> Affidavit by which contempt proceedings were brought about contained averments to effect that petitioner had full knowledge of orders and decrees directing payment of alimony, that he was in arrears, that he was well able to pay same, and that he willfully refused and neglected to do so. Judgment of contempt confirmed truth of all necessary jurisdictional facts averred in affidavit, and declared that petitioner was well able to pay alimony, but willfully, deliberately, and contemptuously neglected and refused to do so.

3. Certiorari 🔑66.

Every intendment is in favor of validity of judgment.

4. Certiorari 🔑66.

In absence of contrary showing in record on certiorari, appellate court will presume trial court proceeded within its jurisdiction.

5. Divorce 🔑269(2).

Where divorced husband admitted default in payment of alimony, court was vested with power to adjudge him guilty of contempt, regardless of amount of arrearage.

Certiorari by Herman W. Brune to annul an order of the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and Frank H. Dunne, a Judge thereof, adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt for failure to pay alimony.

Writ discharged, and proceedings dismissed.

Milton H. Silverberg, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J.

The petitioner, Herman W. Brune, was adjudged guilty of contempt by the Superior Court for failure to pay certain sums of money for the support and maintenance of his wife and his minor child as directed by the terms of an interlocutory decree of divorce theretofore entered in the divorce action; and he seeks in this proceeding in certiorari to have the judgment of contempt annulled, it being alleged in his petition, as grounds for the issuance of the writ, that no testimony was taken at the hearing of the contempt proceeding to substantiate the averments of the affidavits initiating the contempt proceedings; and that petitioner was precluded from introducing testimony showing his inability to comply with said decree or that the amount of the alleged arrearage was incorrect.

[1] As frequently held, in a proceeding such as this, the reviewing court is restricted to a consideration of the single question of whether the trial court exceeded its jurisdiction; and, even though it appear that, during the hearing or in the determination of the matter before it, the trial court may have erred to the prejudice of the petitioner, either in matters of fact or matters of law, relief may not be afforded through the medium of a writ of review. White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 60, 42 P. 480, 481. In the case cited the court goes on to say: "The question being purely one of power, the mere manner in which the contempt proceeding was tried, the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence, and kindred matters, are things wholly without the range of our investigation. Nor can we look into the evidence to inquire as to its sufficiency to sustain the finding and conclusion of the superior court. If the court had jurisdiction, and the recitals of the judgment or order are sufficient to sustain it, those recitals are conclusive upon us in this proceeding. We are confined to the record. 'If the order is one which the court had power to make, it is not for us to inquire whether this power was properly exercised or not. The writ of review is not a writ of error.' Von Roun v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 358."

[2] In the present case, the affidavit by which the contempt proceedings were brought about contains averments to the effect that defendant had full knowledge of the orders and decrees of the court directing him to pay said sums of money, that he was in arrears in making such payments, and that, although well able to pay the same, he willfully refused and neglected so to do. At the hearing of the contempt proceeding, petitioner was present and represented by counsel, and the minutes of the court show that petitioner and his wife were sworn and examined. In its judgment of contempt, besides confirming the truth of all of the jurisdictional facts averred in the affidavit, the court declared "that defendant is well able to pay each and all of said sums," but "willfully, deliberately, and contemptuously" neglected and refused so to do. The record therefore shows complete jurisdiction over the parties and the subject-matter of the proceeding, and consequently is legally sufficient to sustain the judgment of contempt. In re Rasmussen, 56 Cal. App. 368, 205 P. 72; In re McCarty, 154 Cal. 534, 98 P. 540.

[3-5] Answering the contention that petitioner was precluded from showing an inability to pay the amount of the arrearage, it is necessary only to advert to the rule heretofore stated, that every intendment is in favor of the validity of the judgment; and therefore, in the absence from the record of any showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that the trial court proceeded within its jurisdiction with due regard for the rights of the parties. Goodrich v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. App. 695, 268 P. 669. And, with reference to the question of the correctness of the amount of the arrearage, petitioner admits that he was in default in the payment of a considerable sum; consequently, the court was vested with power to adjudge him guilty of contempt, providing the other elements of jurisdiction were present; and the contents of the return to the writ and the records of the court which are made part of the return clearly show that they were.

For the reasons stated, the writ of review is discharged, and the proceedings taken in pursuance thereof are dismissed.

Civ. 355.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 20, 1931.

1. Judgment ⚷101(1).

Plaintiff's right to judgment against defaulting defendant depends on whether complaint states cause of action.

2. Banks and banking ⚷47(2).

Arizona superintendent of banks, commencing action to enforce stockholders' double liability before judicial determination of degree of bank's insolvency, held not entitled to judgment against defaulting defendants.

3. Appeal and error ⚷544(1).

Trial court's finding that certain defendants, in action to enforce double liability of insolvent bank's stockholders, were never stockholders thereof, is conclusive on appeal taken on judgment roll alone.

4. Banks and banking ⚷44.

Double liability of insolvent Arizona bank's stockholders held inapplicable to one acquiring stock before 1912.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action by A. T. Herbert Cutler Brown, of Hollywood, for respondent Smith.

BARNARD, P. J.

A. T. Hammons, superintendent of banks of the state of Arizona and ex officio receiver and in charge of the Bank of Winslow, an insolvent banking corporation of the state of Arizona, brought this action against these defendants residing in the state of California, for the purpose of enforcing and collecting their "double liability" as stockholders of the Bank of Winslow. Before trial, the action was dismissed as to certain of the defendants. Defendants Brown, Moritz, and Zwickey defaulted. Issue was joined by defendants Crozier, Smith, Tuttle, and Ensign, and, after trial, the court entered a judgment that the plaintiff take nothing as against any answering defendant; and, further, that the plaintiff take nothing as against any defaulting defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] Appellant first urges in his opening brief that he is entitled to a judgment against the defaulting defendants. Whether or not this is so depends upon whether the complaint states a cause of action. Swain v. Burnette, 76 Cal. 299, 18 P. 394. In his reply brief, appellant calls attention to the fact that the Supreme Court of Arizona, in the case of Dagg v. Hammons, 34 Ariz. 445, 272 P. 643, an action involving the same bank and the same principles of law as are here involved, decided that there was no cause of action against the stockholders of this bank until the degree of insolvency was judicially determined in the superior court of Arizona, in order to determine what percentage of liability is to be called for from the stockholders. Appellant then admits that this action was prematurely brought, having been commenced before any such judicial determination of the degree of insolvency. In view of this decision of the Supreme Court of Arizona, it appears from the record that the complaint in this action fails to state a cause of action, and no reason appears for reversing that portion of the judgment referring to the defaulting defendants.

[3] Not only does the same situation appear as to the answering defendants, but the record also shows that the trial court found that the defendants Tuttle, Smith, and Crozier were not stockholders in said bank at the time it became insolvent, and have never at any time been such stockholders. This appeal being taken upon the judgment roll alone, this finding of the trial court must be taken as conclusive.

[4] In reference to the defendant Ensign, the court found that he was the owner of ten shares in the Bank of Winslow at the time it became insolvent, but that said ten shares were acquired by him prior to January 1, 1912. In Dagg v. Hammons, supra, the Supreme Court of Arizona held that, under the Constitution and laws of the state of Arizona, the double liability of a stockholder in the particular bank which is involved in this proceeding does not apply to any stock which was originally issued before the year 1912 or to any reissue thereof. Under the facts found herein, the portion of the judgment referring to the answering defendants was therefore correct.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The defendant was convicted under a charge of grand theft, he made a motion for a new trial, his motion was denied, and he has appealed from the judgment and order and has brought up typewritten transcripts.

For several years prior to 1924 the defendant was an attorney at law practicing his profession in San Francisco. On September 25, 1924, he was appointed administrator of the estate of John Quinn, deceased, and thereupon he qualified and continued to act as such administrator until he was removed by an order of court and Eugene Quinn was appointed in his place on August 18, 1926. About one month prior to that date the defendant was adjudged insane and was committed to an asylum where he remained for several months, and then he was released and a short time after he was restored to competency August 14, 1930. Other facts will be stated in connection with the point to which those facts are specially pertinent.

The attorney for the defendant has filed a masterly brief in which he has set forth many points, the facts contained in the record which give rise to the point, and his authorities applicable thereto. The prosecution does not dispute the soundness of many points, but contends that there is no error in the record and presents its theory of the case tending to support its contention. The case is, in this manner, reduced to a few points which we will take up in the sequence in which they appear in the defendant's brief.

[1] The defendant asserts that the property which he embezzled, if any, was not the property of the estate of John Quinn, but in truth and in fact belonged to certain charities. The deceased had been the owner of certain real property in the state of Arizona. Before his death he conveyed certain interests to the above-mentioned charities, reserving a life estate. The rents collected both before and after the death of the decedent had been commingled in one bank deposit at Needles. The defendant took the entire deposit into his possession as administrator. It was his duty to do so. Code Civ. Proc. § 1581. Thereafter the defendant as administrator had at least a special property in said properties until the rights of the real owners were ascertained and determined. Until he had been so discharged, he will not be heard to say he did not receive such properties in his capacity as administrator. People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 P. 630, 39 P. 524; People v. Robertson, 6 Cal. App. 514, 92 P. 498.

[2] In his next point the defendant asserts that the offense was more than three years old when he was indicted, and that the conversion took place in 1925 or 1926, and that the statute of limitations was not tolled by a belated demand August 14, 1930, that being the date of the conversion as claimed by the prosecution. A search of the record does not disclose facts to sustain any of these contentions. From the beginning and until the end of the trial the learned trial judge received any and all evidence which was offered by either party proving or tending to prove a criminal conversion. At the end of the trial the court gave a set of instructions directly to the point that, unless the offense, if any, was committed within three years of the filing of the indictment, the defendant should be acquitted. The evidence shows the defendant received the moneys alleged in the indictment September 27, 1924. In a probate account, filed March 23, 1926, he admitted the receipt of the money. Since that date he has not accounted to the estate of John Quinn for a single dollar. During the presentation of his defense he testified that he did not have the money at the time of the trial, but he produced no vouchers or evidence of lost vouchers. From the time the money was received by him, it would be presumed, until the contrary appeared, that the defendant was innocent of crime. Nothing to the contrary is contained in the record until the making of the demand August 14, 1930. The mere failure of the defendant to pay over money, standing alone, did not constitute an offense. People v. Page, 116 Cal. 386, 48 P. 326; Blake v. State, 12 Okl. Cr. 549, 160 P. 30, L. R. A. 1917B, 1261 and extended note. But when thereafter the prosecution made a legal demand the case stood otherwise. People v. Hatch, 163 Cal. 368, 374, 125 P. 907. True it is that

Eugene Quinn, after he had qualified as the defendant's successor as administrator of the estate of John Quinn, could have made a demand. But he did not do so till August 14, 1930. If this were a civil case his rights might be affected by his delay. However, in this criminal proceeding the prosecution was entitled to present the facts as it found them. In doing so it based its case on the constructive conversion evidenced by the demand dated August 14, 1930. If, as contended by the defendant, the conversion in fact had taken place long prior to that date, he could have shown the fact, but he did not do so.

[3] The defendant earnestly asserts that the evidence shows he parted with the money long before the date of the demand which was made August 14, 1930. In this he is clearly overstating the case. He so testified, but he produced no other evidence showing the payment of any of the moneys to any one at any time. The jury was not bound to accept the defendant's unsupported oath. In this connection it is material to note that the evidence showed that he had previously been convicted of a felony.

[4] It is next claimed that, if the defendant converted any property, it was bonds and not money, and that there was a fatal variance between the allegations and the proof. In the account which the defendant filed in the probate court in March, 1926, he stated that he had invested the moneys in U. S. bonds and had the bonds in a safe deposit box. At the trial of the instant case he testified that the foregoing recitals in the probate account were not true. He never attempted to exhibit the bonds at any time. He never at any time exhibited any vouchers showing such an investment. If he did make the investment, he had no authority to do so. Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179, 188; Estate of Broome, 162 Cal. 258, 263, 122 P. 470. As he received moneys he was bound to account for moneys. In State v. Disbrow, 130 Iowa, 19, 106 N. W. 263, 8 Ann. Cas. 190, at page 192, the Supreme Court of Iowa was considering a similar claim. The court said: "It is unnecessary for us to go into the question whether in any case an indictment charging an embezzlement of money may be upheld by proof of the conversion of a promissory note. In the case before us the appellant guardian received the money. If he let it out upon interest, the promissory notes thus received represented money. In the due course of his business it was his duty to collect and safely keep the funds thus invested. When called upon to surrender his trust, it was incumbent upon him to produce the money or its approved representative. If by a fraudulent abuse of his trust the money which he received for his ward is dissipated and lost, it would seem to be immaterial whether it was lost in the very form in which it came into his hands or after he had changed it into the form of moneyed securities. In any event, the loss or embezzlement is to all intents and purposes the loss and embezzlement of the money intrusted to his keeping. Appellant held the notes as the means or evidence by which he could collect or obtain the actual money for his ward, and if he made use of the power or opportunity thus intrusted to him to get the money into his hands and fraudulently applied it to his own use, the proof of that fact sufficiently sustained the charge made in the indictment. It was money which he received and money for which he must account. (State v. Brooks, 85 Iowa, 366, 52 N. W. 240.)"

[5] It is claimed that the demand was made while the defendant was still incompetent and had not been restored. A petition for restoration was filed May 16, 1930. Later a hearing was had and an order of restoration to capacity was made August 14, 1930. That order spoke as of the 16th day of May, 1930, the day the petition was filed. Metropolis, etc., Sav. Bank v. Barnet, 165 Cal. 449, 452, 132 P. 833. The demand was made August 14, 1930. The making of the demand occurred after the date when the defendant had recovered his health as such date stood determined by the order of restoration.

[6, 7] During the trial the prosecution offered evidence tending to prove other embezzlements by this defendant of other properties which came into his hands as administrator of the estate of John Quinn. The defendant claims such evidence did not prove other embezzlements. Conceding that to be so, we must assume that the jury found accordingly. He also claims that such evidence was not admissible until the corpus delicti had been proved. But the trial court had the power to vary the order of proof. From what has been said above we think it is clear that, when the case went to the jury, the prosecution had introduced sufficient evidence to prove the guilt of the defendant. At that time it could not be said that the corpus delicti had not been proved. The contention that the trial court committed error rests, therefore, on the sole ground that the evidence complained of was admitted out of order. But, as we have stated above, such practice is not error. Pen. Code, §§ 1093, 1094.

We find no error in the record. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF MARYSVILLE v. McCOY, Sheriff.

Civ. 4255.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 18, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 17, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 14, 1931.

1. Execution 🔑158(2).

Invalidity of bond to stay execution because of erroneous recital of court to which appeal was taken held immaterial on question whether court order justified sheriff's return of property levied on to judgment debtor.

> The order recited that good and sufficient bonds on appeal and to stay execution had been filed, and there was no evidence that sheriff was aware of error in recital of court to which appeal was taken.

2. Appeal and error 🔑460(1).

Satisfaction of money judgment is stayed on appeal only on filing of statutory undertaking (Code Civ. Proc. § 942).

3. Execution 🔑158(2).

Filing of bond to stay execution does not authorize sheriff to release property levied on, unless judgment creditor fails to object to sufficiency of sureties for five days (Code Civ. Proc. § 946).

> Code Civ. Proc. § 946, as amended by St. 1913, p. 216, provides that perfected appeal stays all further proceedings and releases property levied on under execution, but that such property shall not be released, if respondent excepts to sufficiency of sureties within five days after giving of undertaking, until such sureties or others justify in manner prescribed by law.

4. Execution 🔑158(2).

Order directing sheriff to return property to judgment debtor held premature, where made within five days after filing of bond to stay execution (Code Civ. Proc. § 946).

5. Appeal and error 🔑477.

Superior court has jurisdiction to stay execution pending appeal and direct sheriff to return property levied on to judgment debtor.

6. Execution 🔑149.

Ordinarily, sheriff must retain custody of property levied on under execution until he may legally dispose of it in satisfaction of judgment.

7. Sheriffs and constables 🔑77.

Sheriff's powers and duties are ministerial.

8. Sheriffs and constables 🔑87.

Sheriff, as court officer, must execute order or process, apparently regular and valid on face and executed by competent authority (Pol. Code, § 4168).

9. Execution 🔑158(2).

Court order specifically directing sheriff to return property to judgment debtor justified his return of property levied on under execution, though made within five days after filing of bond to stay execution (Pol. Code, § 4168; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 942, 946).

10. Sheriffs and constables 🔑98(1).

Sheriff need not search records to dispute specific statements in court order directing him to perform ministerial duty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Petition by the First National Bank of Marysville, a corporation, for a writ of mandamus to Chas. J. McCoy, Sheriff of the County of Yuba, State of California. From a judgment granting a peremptory writ, respondent appeals.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a writ of mandamus directed against the appellant as sheriff of Yuba county to compel him to pay to the assignee of a judgment creditor an amount of money recovered upon the levy of an execution, but which was subsequently returned to the judgment debtor under order of the court.

In an action of assumpsit which was tried in Yuba county, entitled Duryea v. Johnson, the plaintiff recovered judgment in July, 1929. A notice of appeal to the District Court of Appeal was duly filed. No bond staying execution was then filed. An execution was issued and placed in the hands of the appellant for satisfaction. The sheriff promptly levied upon property belonging to the judgment debtor. This property, after due notice, was sold October 23, 1929, for $182. At the same time, the sheriff seized a certain bean-rake belonging to the judgment debtor, which was also noticed for sale to be held on October 31st. On the last-mentioned date, before the sale of the rake, the judgment debtor filed a purported bond for the purpose of staying execution. The bond erroneously recited that, "The defendants in the above-entitled action have appealed to the Supreme Court of the State of California." The court thereupon signed and filed an order in that action staying execution and directing the sheriff to return to the judgment debtor all money and property recovered by the officer under execution. This order contains the following language:

"It appearing to the Court that the defendant has appealed from the decision rendered herein in favor of the plaintiff and after filing a good and sufficient bond upon appeal, and also to stay the writ of execution, now,

"It Is Therefore Ordered, and the Sheriff of the County of Yuba, State of California, is hereby directed to stay all proceedings under and by virtue of the execution now in his hands and to return any and all property to the judgment debtor which he may have in his custody by virtue of any process hereunto issued out of the above entitled Court and cause."

Pursuant to the foregoing order, the sheriff promptly delivered to the judgment debtor the said sum of money which he had obtained on sale of personal property, together with the bean-rake held pursuant to the authority conferred by the execution. On the day following the filing of this undertaking to stay execution, and following the making of the foregoing court order and return of the property by the sheriff, the judgment creditor served and filed a notice excepting to the sufficiency of the sureties on this stay bond. The sheriff was also served with a copy of this notice. The sureties failed to justify. Upon default of the sureties, the court made an order, November 19, 1929, setting the stay bond aside and directing the sheriff to proceed to enforce the satisfaction of the judgment by execution. The sheriff, however, was unable to recover the money or property delivered by him to the judgment debtor. After demand and failure to recover this money or property, this petition for a writ of mandamus was filed. The foregoing facts appear in the pleadings without substantial dispute.

At the trial upon this petition for writ of mandamus the court found that the sheriff had duly levied upon the property of the judgment debtor in the action entitled Duryea v. Johnson and had recovered the sum of $182 and one bean-rake of the reasonable value of $70; and that this property was wrongfully withheld from the judgment creditor. Thereupon a peremptory writ of mandamus was issued directing the sheriff to forthwith pay to the judgment creditor in that action said sum of $182 and deliver to him said bean-rake, or, in lieu thereof, the further sum of $70 as the reasonable value thereof. From this judgment an appeal was perfected.

The appellant contends that even though the court order directing him to return the money and property to the judgment debtor was unauthorized, it appears to have been duly and regularly made by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and therefore justifies his delivery of the property.

[1] It is immaterial that the bond may have been void from its inception on account of an erroneous recital therein that the appeal had been taken to the "Supreme Court," instead of to the District Court of Appeal. It has been held this error invalidates the bond. McAulay v. Tahoe Ice Co., 3 Cal. App. 642, 86 P. 912; Bergevin v. Wood, 11 Cal. App. 643, 105 P. 935. This error, however, did not appear upon the court order directing the sheriff to return the property. There is no evidence the sheriff was aware of this error. The court recited in its order that "a good and sufficient bond upon appeal, and also to stay the writ of execution," had been filed.

[2, 3] It is true that the satisfaction of a money judgment is not stayed on appeal except upon the filing of an undertaking for that purpose as provided by section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Even when this bond to stay execution has been filed, the sheriff is not authorized to release property in his possession upon which he has regularly levied on execution unless the judgment creditor fails for a period of five days after the filing thereof to object to the sufficiency of the sureties thereon. Section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, in part: "Whenever an appeal is perfected, as provided in the preceding sections of this chapter, it stays all further proceedings * * * and releases from levy property which has been levied upon under execution issued upon such judgment; provided, however, said property shall not be released from the levy, if the respondent excepts to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the giving of the undertaking staying execution until such sureties, or others, justify in the manner prescribed by law. * * *"

The case of Sam Yuen v. McMann, 99 Cal. 497, 34 P. 80, is not in conflict with the foregoing construction of section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is true that case held that it was the duty of a sheriff to return property recovered from a judgment debtor pursuant to an execution when a stay bond is filed regardless of the right of the judgment creditor to except to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days thereafter. But the Code did not then contain the proviso with relation to the privilege of excepting to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the filing of the bond. Section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure was subsequently amended by adding the above proviso (Stats. 1913, p. 216).

[4, 5] Pursuant to the statute last quoted it is apparent the foregoing order of court directing the sheriff to return the property to the judgment debtor was premature and unauthorized. But the court did have jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Donegan v. City of Los Angeles (Dorsey v. City of Los Angeles) (Cal. App.) 293 P. 912. Although the order was based upon an erroneous assumption of the law and an incorrect statement of facts, it nevertheless furnishes a complete justification for the sheriff to return the property since no evidence of its invalidity appears upon the face of the order. Section 4168 of the Political Code provides: "A sheriff or other ministerial officer is justified in the execution of, and must execute, all process and orders regular on their face and issued by competent authority, whatever may be the defect in the proceedings upon which they were issued."

[6-8] It is ordinarily the duty of a sheriff to retain the custody of property acquired by levy, until he may dispose of it in satisfaction of the judgment pursuant to law. He may become civilly liable for an illegal or unauthorized disposition of the property. 23 Cal. Jur. 305, § 17; 23 Cal. Jur. 311, § 20. The powers and duties of a sheriff, however, are ministerial in their nature. He is an officer of the court and should render obedience to the mandates of court unless the process or order appears upon its face to be illegal or that it was issued without jurisdiction. 23 Cal. Jur. 294, § 7. When the order or process appears to be regular and valid upon its face and to have been executed by competent authority, it is the duty of a sheriff to execute it. Section 4168, Pol. Code; 23 Cal. Jur. 300, § 13; Burlingame v. Traeger, 101 Cal. App. 365, 369, 281 P. 1051, 1052; 1 Freeman on Executions (3d Ed.) p. 362, § 101. In the authority last cited, it is said: "The sheriff may limit his inquiries to an inspection of the writ. If the writ is issued by the proper officer, in due form, and appears to proceed from a court competent to exercise jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the suit, to grant the relief granted and enforce it by the writ issued, and there is nothing on the face of the writ showing a want of jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, or showing the writ to be clearly illegal from some other cause, the officer may safely proceed. * * * Officers are also protected where, though the court had jurisdiction, the writ is void as between the parties thereto on account of something not appearing on the face thereof. * * * The rule that an officer may justify under a writ valid on its face is one of protection. * * * An officer may limit his inquiries to an inspection of the face of the writ, and * * * he is not to be held responsible for anything of which the writ gives no notice, and of which he has no actual knowledge."

To the same effect, it is said in the case of Burlingame v. Traeger, supra: "An officer to whom an order or a warrant of arrest has been delivered for execution is not required at his peril to look behind the order if it appears to be regular on its face and issued by a court of competent jurisdiction. * * * As said in Magnaud v. Traeger, 66 Cal. App. 526, 226 P. 990, 992: 'Without doubt, if a writ or an order commanding a sheriff to do or to refrain from doing an act be legal upon its face and show an apparent jurisdiction, and if the court issuing the writ or making the order has jurisdiction of the subject matter, the officer will be protected when in good faith he acts in obedience to the writ or to the order.'"

[9, 10] In the present case the sheriff appears to have acted in perfect good faith. Since the order of the court stated that "a good and sufficient bond * * * to stay the writ of execution" had been filed, and since the order fails to state when the undertaking was filed, the sheriff was justified in assuming that the bond conformed in every way to the requirements of the law, and that the five days allowed by statute for excepting to the sufficiency of the sureties had elapsed. The order also specifically directed the sheriff "to return any and all property to the judgment debtor which he may have in his custody." This order was valid on its face. The sheriff is a mere ministerial officer. He is not required, at his peril, to search the records to dispute specific statements which are recited in a court order directing him to perform a ministerial duty. The sheriff is fully protected by the court order directing him to return the property. The writ of mandate was therefore erroneously issued in the present case.

The judgment is reversed.

Rehearing Denied April 15, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 14, 1931.

1. Limitation of actions 🔑127(5).

Amended complaint, alleging disturbed menstrual function, in addition to back and other injuries, recited in original complaint, held not to state new cause of action barred by limitations.

2. Limitation of actions 🔑127(2).

Where amended complaint does not change cause of action, limitations run to filing of original complaint.

3. Damages 🔑158(3).

Evidence of disturbed menstrual function, alleged in amended complaint filed after statutory period, held admissible under general averment of bodily injury in original complaint.

4. Damages 🔑158(2).

Under general averments of injuries proximately caused by defendant's negligence, plaintiff may prove any specific injury traceable to, and naturally resulting from, occurrence complained of.

5. Trial 🔑140(1), 143.

It is jury's province to pass on conflicting evidence, inconsistent statements, and witnesses' credibility.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1001(1).

Jury's verdict, supported by substantial evidence, cannot be disturbed by appellate court for insufficiency of evidence.

7. New trial 🔑70.

It is trial court's province to grant new trial, where evidence is insufficient to sustain verdict.

8. Damages 🔑131(4).

Verdict awarding woman $6,695 damages for back injuries, consisting of contusions and strained ligaments, nervous shock, kidney adhesions, and disturbed menstrual function, held not excessive.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1004(1).

Question of excessive damages is first addressed to trial court, and appellate court can interfere only when damages are so excessive as to suggest jury's passion, prejudice, or corruption at first blush.

TYLER, P. J.

Action for damages for personal injuries.

The complaint in substance alleged that on the 19th day of February, 1928, plaintiff was a passenger on a street car and at that time defendant negligently backed a truck which he was driving into said car, thereby throwing the plaintiff against a certain stanchion, inflicting injuries to her back consisting of contusions and strained ligaments; she also alleged that she suffered a shock to her nervous system. She further claimed that in consequence of these injuries, she suffered adhesions of her kidneys and such injuries were permanent in character. Damages were prayed for in the sum of $20,000. Trial was had before a jury which resulted in a disagreement.

Thereafter plaintiff filed an amended complaint, alleging that in addition to the injuries recited in her original complaint she suffered a disturbed menstrual function. A demurrer was filed to this complaint, but it was overruled. A second trial was had and the jury found for plaintiff in the sum of $6,695. Motion for new trial was made and denied.

[1-9] This is an appeal from the judgment. As ground for reversal it is first argued that the trial court erred in overruling the demurrer to the amended complaint, for the reason that the amendment included an alleged injury which was barred by the statute of limitations. The amendment was made more than a year after the accident happened. It is claimed that the amendment states a new cause of action not found in the original complaint. We cannot agree to this contention as we are of the opinion that the amendment did not state a new cause of action, but on the contrary merely set forth more fully the cause of action alleged in the original complaint, and related back to the time of the commencement of the action. Where a cause of action is not changed, the time to which the statute of limitations runs is the filing of the original complaint. Then again evidence of the injury as set forth in the amended complaint could have been offered under the averments contained in the original complaint, as such evidence was admissible under the general averment of bodily injury and resulting damages. Samuels v. California St., etc., Ry. Co., 124 Cal. 294, 56 P. 1115. Under general averments as to injuries suffered, which are alleged to have been proximately caused by defendant's negligence, it is proper and competent for plaintiff to prove any specific injury which she might have sustained. It is sufficient if such injuries can be traced to the occurrence complained of and are such as might naturally result from the injury. Latky v. Wolfe, 85 Cal. App. 332, 333, 259 P. 470. Appellant next contends that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, as there was a failure to prove the damages alleged in the complaint as the proximate result of appellant's alleged negligence. It is also claimed that plaintiff's own testimony was inconsistent and contradictory concerning the injuries she claimed to have suffered. From a reading of the statement of plaintiff's evidence, we cannot escape the conclusion that it seems far from satisfactory, still there is ample evidence which if believed by the jury sustains the verdict. This being so, it is not our province to review or weigh the evidence in determining its character. It was the province of the jury to pass upon all questions of conflicting evidence or inconsistent statements, or the credibility of witnesses, and its verdict cannot be disturbed for insufficiency of the evidence where there is any evidence to support it. Zipperlen v. Southern Pacific Co., 7 Cal. App. 206, 93 P. 1049. Where a verdict is attacked for insufficiency of evidence, the power of the appellate court begins and ends with the inquiry whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the conclusion reached by the jury. Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 260, 228 P. 25; Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 239 P. 709, 41 A. L. R. 1027. It is the province of the trial court to grant a new trial where there is an insufficiency of evidence to sustain a verdict. Here a motion was made for a new trial and it was denied. Nor do we think, considering the nature of plaintiff's alleged injuries, that the verdict is excessive. If such injuries were the result of the accident, as the jury determined they were, the verdict is certainly not excessive. The question of excessive damages is one which is first addressed to the trial court, and appellate courts can interfere only when the damages are so exorbitant as to suggest, at first blush, passion, prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury. Complaint is next made that the court erred in instructing the jury as to the maximum damages they might award plaintiff under the law as to the reasonableness of damages. In this connection it is claimed that the instructions upon this subject taken together justified the jury in concluding the court's meaning to be that any award even to the full amount claimed would be reasonable. We have read the instructions and they admit of no such construction. Ellis v. Central California Trac. Co., 37 Cal. App. 390, 174 P. 407.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 352.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 19, 1931.

1. Judgment ⟹461(4).

As regards setting aside default judgment, finding notice of overruling demurrer to amended cross-complaint was served held supported by evidence.

2. Judgment ⟹435.

In action in equity to set aside final judgment, mere showing of mistake is insufficient.

3. Judgment ⟹461(5).

In action in equity to set aside judgment, evidence supported finding of absence of fraud or collusion.

4. Judgment ⟹429.

In action in equity to set aside judgment for cross-complainant in another action in superior court, that plaintiffs previously recovered judgment in municipal court, arising out of same accident, was not ground for relief.

> Such fact, if having any bearing, was defense to be set up in superior court in original action.

5. Judgment ⟹408.

That judgment purported to be upon amended cross-complaint, though default order was upon cross-complaint, and that judgment was defective, did not entitle cross-defendant to relief in action in equity to set aside judgment; there being adequate remedy at law.

6. Judgment ⟹429.

Party is not entitled to relief in equity against judgment upon grounds which would have been defense or should have been set up in original action.

7. Judgment ⚿437.

That attorney was suspended after default judgment against clients held insufficient to set judgment aside.

> Default complained of was entered April 7, 1927, but judgment based thereon was not entered until February 3, 1928, and attorney in question was admitted by pleadings to have been suspended on March 1, 1928. It appeared that attorney was in good standing at time events complained of took place. Hence, under established rules, circumstances were not sufficient to set aside final judgment by bringing action in equity, as against contention that, since attorney was suspended from practice of law shortly after proceeding complained of, fact was sufficient circumstance to entitle clients to relief in equity; it appearing that same attorney had previously neglected their business.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by Frank T. De Tray and another against R. C. Chambers. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an action in equity, brought for the purpose of setting aside a judgment obtained by the defendant herein against these plaintiffs in another action now pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county. In that other action, Frank T. De Tray and Ethel B. De Tray were suing R. C. Chambers and his wife for damages growing out of an automobile accident. Chambers and his wife answered, and at the same time R. C. Chambers filed a cross-complaint naming Frank R. De Tray and Ethel B. De Tray as cross-defendants. A general demurrer to this cross-complaint was sustained as to the cross-defendant Ethel B. De Tray. Later, an amended cross-complaint was filed by R. C. Chambers, and a demurrer thereto was overruled on March 16, 1927. On April 8, 1927, there was filed a notice of the overruling of this demurrer, which bore upon it an admission of service of the same. No answer was filed to the amended cross-complaint, and on April 21, 1927, an order was filed asking that the default of the cross-defendants be entered. Such a default was entered by the clerk on that day, and on February 3, 1928, a judgment for $800 and costs was entered on the cross-complaint. The court having refused relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure upon the ground that application therefor was made too late, this action in equity was brought for the purpose of setting aside the judgment referred to. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiffs have appealed.

[1] Appellants' first contention is that certain findings, to the effect that notice of the overruling of the demurrer to the amended cross-complaint was served, are not supported by the evidence. The evidence shows that there was filed a notice of the overruling of this demurrer which had upon it the following:

"Service of the within notice is hereby admitted this 7 day of April, 1927. R. C. W. Friday & Ira A. Gwin, Attorneys for Plaintiff."

It appears from the evidence that while appellants had employed Friday as their attorney in that action, Gwin was at that time associated with Friday and in his offices; that they had an arrangement between them for dividing fees on matters that Gwin handled; that Friday depended upon Gwin to handle cases which he turned over to him; that Gwin prepared the pleadings in that action and was handling these demurrers; that Gwin frequently consulted with these appellants about that case, sometimes in the presence of Friday and sometimes alone; that a record of the service of this notice of overruling the demurrer was made by Gwin in his daybook; and that Gwin was in the habit of accepting service on documents on behalf of Friday, with Friday's knowledge and consent. This evidence is ample to sustain the findings complained of.

[2, 3] The court found that the attorney for the cross-defendants believed the amended cross-complaint to be a counterclaim, and for that reason failed to file an answer thereto. Appellants' next contention is that since the court thus found that a mistake had been made by the lawyer, equity has jurisdiction to give relief. In this connection may be considered another contention to the effect that equity will always give relief when there is no remedy at law. However, something more is required in an action in equity to set aside a judgment which has become final, than a mere showing of mistake. In Frost v. Hanscome, 198 Cal. 550, 246 P. 53, 57, the court said: "Equity will not afford relief against a final judgment unless extrinsic fraud and a meritorious defense be both alleged and proved. * * * Assuming that the allegations of the complaint herein were sufficient, the proof fell far short of establishing either requirement."

The last sentence might well have been used in the instant case. The court found that there was no fraud or collusion on the part of the cross-complainant and that no deception was practiced upon the court or upon these appellants. Not only does the evidence support this finding, but there is no evidence to the contrary. In Amestoy Estate Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 5 Cal App. 273, 90 P. 42, 44, the court said:

> "That a former judgment may be set aside by a court of equity on the ground of fraud, it must be fraud extrinsic or collateral to the questions examined and determined in the action. * * *
> "A different rule obtains when the proceedings are under section 473, Code Civ. Proc. That section is broad enough to justify the action of the court in relieving a party from a mistake of law upon the part of his attorney when from reliance thereon he was prevented from making a defense. Douglass v. Todd, 96 Cal. 657, 31 Am. St. Rep. 247, 31 P. 623. The broad provisions of that section are available, however, only to those seeking relief thereunder. It cannot be construed as an attempt to broaden the powers of a court of equity in determining its jurisdiction in an independent proceeding. The reason for applying different rules is obvious. In the one case, the motion is directed to the discretion of a trial court within a limited time and before the judgment has become final; in the other, it is the exercise of equitable powers by an independent court based upon established rules. The restricted power of equity is founded upon the proposition that the verity of a judgment should under all circumstances be maintained when the attack is only upon those matters considered by the court upon the original hearing, without which rule there would be no end to litigation, and no permanent rights could be established by judgments and decrees."

[4-6] Appellants urge that they had previously recovered a judgment in still another case in the municipal court, in an action arising out of the same automobile collision, If that had any bearing at all, it was a matter of defense which should have been set up in the original action. They also urge that the judgment in the original action purported to have been entered upon an amended cross-complaint, while the order to enter default was upon a cross-complaint; and also that the judgment in the original action was not in proper form and was defective. In the two last-mentioned respects, appellants had an adequate remedy, including an appeal. A plaintiff is not entitled to relief in equity upon grounds which would have been a defense, or which should have been set up in the original action. McPhee v. Reclamation District, 161 Cal. 566, 119 P. 1077. In Brum v. Ivins, 154 Cal. 17, 96 P. 876, 878, 129 Am. St. Rep. 137, the court said: "A court of equity is asked to interfere on behalf of a judgment debtor who claims that he had a meritorious defense to the original action, but failed to set up that defense. His neglect to appear in the justice's court and deny the averments of the complaint which had been served upon him was not due to any imposition or fraud on the part of the adverse party, nor is there a showing of mistake, surprise, or other equitable ground excusing the failure to defend. Nothing is better settled than the rule that a defendant who, under such circumstances, fails to defend against an action at law, cannot have relief in equity against the judgment in the action, on grounds which would have been a defense to the original suit."

[7] While appellants admit that they were unable to prove fraud, they contend that since their attorney was suspended from the practice of the law shortly after the proceedings complained of, that fact is a sufficient circumstance to entitle them to relief in equity, since it now appears that this same attorney had previously neglected their business. The default complained of was entered on April 7, 1927. The judgment based thereon was not entered until February 3, 1928, and the attorney in question is admitted by the pleadings to have been suspended on March 1, 1928. It appears that the attorney was in good standing at the time the events complained of took place. Irrespective of any sympathy we may have for the appellants, they are themselves responsible for the selection of an attorney and no fault, in that respect, is even charged to the respondent. While the circumstances may be unfortunate, under established rules, they are not sufficient to set aside a final judgment. Not only is it necessary that a certain security and permanence attach to a judgment which has been allowed to become final, but parties are given a very considerable time and opportunity to protect their interests before a judgment becomes final, and while the established rules may occasionally work a hardship, it cannot be questioned that, in general, they are wise and beneficial.

Appellants further contend that the original judgment which this action sought to set aside is absolutely void and therefore may be attacked anywhere, directly or collaterally. So far as our attention has been called to the facts, the judgment would appear to have been only voidable, at most, and the matters alleged called for action in the original case. Had such action been taken, all errors alleged could have there been cured.

The trial court having upon sufficient evidence found against the contentions of appellants on all of the essential matters, and no grounds for equitable relief being here shown, the findings and conclusions complained of cannot be here disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

In deciding whether automobile indemnity policy extends to particular operator of automobile, court will seek intention of parties.

"Omnibus Coverage Endorsement," stated to be substitute for inconsistent provisions in automobile indemnity policy, extended coverage to any person legally operating automobile with insured's consent, leaving matter of operator's age to be determined by laws of state or subdivision, notwithstanding clause in policy excepting operator under 16.

While policy provided that it should not cover in respect to automobile driven by person under sixteen years of age, rider entitled "Omnibus Coverage Endorsement" extended policy to "any person" while "legally operating" automobile, and provided that indorsement was issued subject to provisos, conditions, and warranties contained in policy "if not inconsistent herewith."

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; H. S. Gans, Judge.

Action by Virginia Swift against the Zurich General Accident & Liability Insurance Company, Limited. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco (A. Dal Thomson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Jerome H. Bayer and George N. Crocker, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued upon a policy of insurance providing indemnity in the operation of a certain automobile. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant has appealed on typewritten transcripts.

While the automobile was being driven by plaintiff's minor son a collision occurred. Suit was commenced against plaintiff for damages. The matter was settled, and judgment was by consent entered against plaintiff for $1,887. Plaintiff then sued defendant on her policy for this sum and obtained judgment in that amount.

The policy undertook to indemnify the plaintiff against loss from the liability imposed by law respecting bodily injuries "by any person or persons (except those persons referred to in the proviso entitled 'Exclusions') as a result of the ownership, maintenance or use of" the automobile. The paragraph entitled "Exclusions" provided that the policy should not cover in respect to an automobile while driven by any person under sixteen years of age, or by any person under the age fixed by law, or while driven in any race or speed test, or elsewhere than within the limits of the United States and Canada. A rider was attached to the policy entitled "Omnibus Coverage Endorsement" and reading: "The policy * * * is hereby extended to apply to any person or persons * * * while riding in or legally operating any of the automobiles * * * and any person * * * legally responsible for the operation thereof. * * * This endorsement is issued subject to all the provisos, conditions and warranties contained in the policy * * * if not inconsistent herewith." (Italics ours.)

[1] The single question of law involved on this appeal is whether this omnibus coverage rider supersedes the proviso in the body of the policy to the effect that the policy should not cover when the car was operated by one under sixteen years of age. In deciding a question of this character, the courts will always seek to find the intention of the parties. The trial court found and ruled that this proviso was superseded by the omnibus clause, and we are satisfied that this judgment should be affirmed.

[2] In the original printed form of the policy the company agreed to indemnify the assured against damages suffered by any person or persons (except those persons mentioned in the proviso) as a result of the operation of the car. There was no limitation upon the right of the assured to permit another to operate the car, but there was an uncertainty in the policy as to the liability of the company for damages resulting while another operated the car with the owner's consent. The "persons" excepted from the policy by the proviso are those suffering injury through the operation of the car by one under legal age, by one under sixteen years of age, and by one engaged in a race or traveling outside the limits of the United States and Canada. By the terms of the rider the coverage of the policy was extended to apply to any person or persons legally operating the car with the consent of the assured. The rider is designated as "Omnibus Coverage Endorsement" and must be interpreted as a special provision of the policy relating to the subject of coverage of persons. When, by the express terms of the rider, it is declared to be a substitute for any inconsistent provision in the body of the policy it would seem that the intention of the parties was to treat the rider as extending the coverage to "any person or persons * * * legally operating the car" with the consent of the assured, leaving the matter of the age of the operator to be determined by the laws of the state or political subdivision where the car was operated.

[3-5] The only rules of law involved in the appeal are that the rider must be read with every clause of the policy as if it were set forth in the body of the policy (Burr v. Western States Life Ins. Co. [Cal. Sup.] 296 P. 273) that, when it is expressly stated in the rider that it is substituted for inconsistent provisions of the body of the policy, the rider will control (32 Cor. Jur., pp. 1159, 1160), and that, when there is any ambiguity in the policy caused by the insurer, the policy will be given an interpretation most favorable to the assured (Maryland C. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 178 Cal. 491, 494, 173 P. 993; 14 Cal. Jur., p. 443, § 24).

Here the policy seems to have been written with the design to make it ambiguous, because, if the omnibus coverage indorsement contained in the rider was not intended to be "omnibus" in the matter of coverage, but was intended to be controlled by inconsistent exceptions in the body of the policy, it would have been a simple matter to have so declared that intention in the rider. If, therefore, we have misjudged the intention of the parties in the interpretation we have placed upon the contract, the respondent is nevertheless entitled to that interpretation under the rule stated in the section in California Jurisprudence cited above.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondent, Rightman, in an action to establish and foreclose a materialman's lien.

[1, 2] Respondent, Rightman, is the owner of a certain store building, and let a store therein to L. C. Parslow Stores Co. The Parslow Company purchased lumber and similar material from appellant of the value of $260.60, which was used to equip the store for use by it. Appellant claims that the judgment is erroneous because the evidence shows that the material was all affixed to the building. The evidence does not so show, however. The witness Morris, called by appellant, testified that there were eight or ten tables which were not attached to the floor in any way, and there is also evidence from which the court could conclude that at least some of the counters and shelves were not affixed to the building.

The burden was on plaintiff to show just what material was affixed to the building and its value. We have searched the record in vain for any evidence from which the trial court or this court could determine what part of the material furnished was affixed to the building or what was its value. Appellant "could not assert a lien for materials of uncertain value and amount." Hammond Lumber Co. v. Pile, 202 Cal. 624, 625, 262 P. 715; McClain v. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Dorothy F. Moore, by Samuel W. Moore, her guardian ad litem, against Roland P. Bishop and others, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Bishop & Company, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal.

Appeal from the order denying a new trial dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Charles H. Goebel, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. Joseph Ford, J. F. Moroney, and Patrick F. Kirby, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The respondent, a minor of the age of about nine years, was injured by a truck of the appellant copartnership, which was being driven by appellant Swadener, while attempting to cross a public street in the city of Los Angeles. In an action by her guardian ad litem she was awarded judgment in the sum of $800, and the defendants appealed.

Respondent was walking with other children in an easterly direction on the sidewalk along the southerly side of Fourth street. The truck was traveling in a southerly direction on Soto street toward Fourth street. Both entered the intersection at about the time the street signals changed to direct traffic easterly and westerly. The respondent testified that when she stepped into Fourth street she looked in each direction, and that the only machines she saw seemed to be about one block away. There is a conflict of evidence as to whether one or both signals had sounded when the children left the curb. One of them swore that the second signal had sounded when the truck arrived at the southerly line of the street car tracks, and the driver testified that it was running at about 12 to 15 miles an hour. It could reasonably have been inferred by the jury that appellant Swadener drove into the intersection without slackening speed nor contemplating the possibility of a change of signals or the presence of school children on the street.

[1-6] Appellants' various contentions—that is, that there was no evidence of negligence, that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, and that an instruction as to the duty of the driver to foresee danger of children at the intersection and to control his truck accordingly was erroneous—present questions which under the circumstances of the case lay to a great extent within the province of the jury and the discretion of the trial court. As to whether or not the weight and speed of the vehicle, the importance and exigency of business as compared with safety, the proximity of a street crossing and imminence of stop signals, as well as the rights of pedestrians, were all considered and observed, remained for the jury to determine. They were questions of fact which, if supported by any substantial evidence, were conclusively ascertained at the trial and there finally decided. A city ordinance introduced by the defendants provides that when a bell of the traffic signal rings no traffic shall enter an intersection until the green or "go" signal is shown, that "it shall be unlawful for any pedestrian to cross the roadway other than with released traffic," and that the "green" signal "requires that the traffic shall move and remain in motion, except when stopped for the purpose of avoiding an accident or in case of other emergency," etc. The rule applicable to steam railroads, that an engineer need not stop his train, but might assume that one approaching the track would halt or leave the right of way, is stressed by the citation of numerous authorities appropriate to such cases. And it is insisted from the foregoing that if respondent entered the intersection contrary to the provisions of the ordinance, she would be guilty of a violation of law, and hence of contributory negligence. This would compel the inference that the driver of an automobile upon urban highways. in thickly populated centers, may proceed with an assurance and momentum commensurate with the independence and despatch of an interurban steam trunk line over a private right of way. In view of the record in this case, either proposition would be abhorrent to the law and to reason. Not alone is there evidence from which the jury might properly have concluded that the children did not violate the ordinance in this respect, but they would have been justified in finding, as doubtless they did, from the speed of the machine and the circumstances of the collision, that the truck entered the intersection after the signal had sounded, and that it was not under control, enabling the driver to comply with the exception, "for the purpose of avoiding an accident." It has repeatedly been held that the driver of an automobile has no right to assume that the road is clear, but under all circumstances, and at all times, he must be vigilant and must anticipate and expect the presence of others. Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 201 P. 471; Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066; Morgan v. L. A. R. & G. Co., 105 Cal. App. 224, 287 P. 152. Further, contributory negligence will not ordinarily be attributed to a child of tender years. Seperman v. Lyon Fire Proof Storage Co., 97 Cal. App. 654, 275 P. 980. Contributory negligence of a minor must, in the nature of the case, be a question of fact for the jury rather than of law for the court; and it is their province to determine whether or not the child duly exercised such judgment as she possessed, taking into consideration her years, experience, and ability. The ordinary care which a child of limited judgment and experience is called upon to exercise in a given act is not the same quantum of care which an adult would be called upon to use under the same circumstances. Foley v. Cal. Horseshoe Co., 115 Cal. 184, 47 P. 42, 56 Am. St. Rep. 87; O'Connor v. Golden Gate W. M. Co., 135 Cal. 537, 67 P. 966, 87 Am. St. Rep. 127; Jenson v. Will & Finck, 150 Cal. 398, 89 P. 113.

[7, 8] It is contended that the doctrine of last clear chance involves an assumption of gross negligence on the part of the defendant, and that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that: "One having knowledge of the dangerous situation of another, and having a clear opportunity by the exercise of proper care to avoid injuring another, must do so, notwithstanding that the latter has placed himself or herself in such situation of danger by his or her own negligence. If, therefore, you should find from the evidence that the driver of the truck in question, which collided with the plaintiff, saw the plaintiff in the street and could have stopped his truck without injuring her, and by so stopping the truck within the shortest time and space possible under the circumstances could have avoided the collision, and neglected to do so, in consequence of which neglect to so stop said truck the plaintiff was injured, then the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, provided, after discovering her peril, she used ordinary care to escape injury." It is contended that there is no evidence in the record tending to show that the driver had such opportunity and that he failed to avail himself thereof. Conflicting testimony of several witnesses placed the respondent at distances of from two to twenty-five feet from the westerly curb at the time of her injury by the truck. The driver's own version of the occurrence is far from consistent. It appeared that thousands of children daily crowded the streets at this intersection from four schools in the immediate vicinity, and that the driver constantly traversed the same and was fully aware of such conditions. It also appeared from his testimony that he first saw the child about sixty feet away, and that he continued his course about the same distance before stopping after the impact. The street was about sixty feet in width. When asked where he was when the bell rang, he testified, "I was just entering the intersection," and that when the plaintiff started to cross he "was just crossing the second car tracks." "The doctrine of last clear chance applies equally to the case of where the plaintiff is wholly unaware of the danger and for that reason unable to escape it as to the case of being in a position of danger from which he cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care." Hoy v. Tornich, 199 Cal. 545, 250 P. 565. From the evidence as disclosed to the jury, we do not deem the instruction in question unwarranted or prejudicial.

[9] The defendants appealed from an order denying a new trial. Such order being reviewable only upon appeal from the judgment, the appeal therefrom is dismissed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Complaint was not insufficient on theory that one paragraph alleged fraud only upon information and belief where another paragraph definitely and positively alleged fraud in particulars clearly set forth.

2. Estoppel 🔑78(1).

Clause in land contract that purchaser is not induced to buy by vendor's representations is not controlling, when entire contract is induced by fraud.

The contract in question contained a clause to the effect that the property had been inspected by the purchaser, and was being purchased as a result of that inspection, and not because of any representation made by the vendor or any selling agent of the vendor.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑44.

Conflicting evidence did not conclusively show that stakes showed number of lot purchased.

Purchaser suing for rescission of land contract contended that he was not able to determine the correct number of the lot from an inspection of the property, and there was conflict in testimony as to whether numbered stakes were on lots at time lots were inspected by plaintiff.

4. Contracts 🔑270(1).

General rule is, person desiring to rescind must do so promptly.

5. Contracts 🔑97(1).

One retaining benefits of contract and continuing to treat it as binding is deemed to have waived fraud and elected to affirm contract.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1).
Contracts 🔑270(3).

Whether party has rescinded contract promptly on discovering fraud is ordinarily question for trial court, and, if its conclusion is reasonably supported, appellate court will not interfere.

7. Vendor and purchaser 🔑119.

Purchaser's right to rescind land contract held not barred by laches.

The contract was dated November 10, 1924, and the complaint alleged that the plaintiff on October 8, 1925, first discovered that he had been given contract for different lot than he had inspected; that he immediately notified vendor's agents, and demanded agreement be corrected; that he had numerous conferences from that day until October 28, 1926, in attempting to adjust matter, and, upon conclusion of such negotiations, vendor's agents refused to correct agreement or return amount paid, and plaintiff served written notice of rescission, after which action was filed January 14, 1927.

8. Vendor and purchaser 🔑44.

Substantial damage to purchaser was shown, where he received different lot than he agreed to buy and lot received required more excavation.

A great deal more excavation would be required upon the lot received than upon that which purchaser agreed to buy in order to build thereon, and lot he agreed to buy had frontage upon two streets, which fact was mainly responsible for his entering into the agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. Cloyd Snyder, Judge.

Suit by Harry I. Sherratt against the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

L. E. Dadmun, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Youngworth, McClean & Hartman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an action for rescission of a contract to purchase real estate and to recover the portion of the purchase price paid. The action is based upon the claim that the plaintiff was fraudulently shown a particular lot in a subdivision by certain of the defendants acting as agents for certain other defendants, and that, after agreeing to purchase the property upon which they then stood, the plaintiff was given a contract for a different lot, being one that he had particularly refused to buy. This contract was dated November 10, 1924. There were no buildings on the lot, and the complaint alleges that the plaintiff first discovered he had been given a contract for a different lot on or about the 8th day of October, 1925; that he immediately notified the agents who had sold him the property, and demanded that the agreement be corrected to describe the lot he had agreed to buy; and that from that day until the 28th day of October, 1926, the plaintiff and the defendant agents held numerous conferences in attempting to settle and adjust the matter, but, upon the conclusion of these negotiations, the defendant agents refused to correct the agreement or to return the amount paid. Thereupon the plaintiff served a written notice of rescission and offered to restore everything of value which he had received. This action was filed on January 14, 1927, and, from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants have appealed.

[1, 2] Appellants first attack the sufficiency of the complaint. A number of suggestions are made, which are obviously without merit, and only two grounds of attack are sufficiently set forth to call for attention. It is first insisted that the complaint does not allege fraud definitely, but only upon information and belief. This is apparently addressed to paragraph VI of the complaint, in which an allegation, upon information and belief, is intended to apply to the knowledge of the defendants. Aside from any other consideration, paragraph V of the complaint definitely and positively alleges fraud in particulars which are clearly set forth. Another alleged reason why the complaint is not sufficient is, that the contract contains a clause to the effect that the property had been inspected by the buyer, and was being purchased as a result of that inspection, and not because of any representation made by the seller or any selling agent of the seller. Not only does this clause of the contract not appear in the complaint, but, in any event, the clause is not controlling when the entire contract has been induced by fraud. As was said in Palladine v. Imperial Valley Farm Lands Ass'n, 65 Cal. App. 727, 225 P. 291, 299: "The fraud which was the inducing cause of the execution of the contract renders the whole instrument vulnerable—the clause in question as well as all the other provisions."

[3] A number of other points are raised which all go to the effect that the plaintiff personally inspected the property and did not rely upon any representations made, and a particular finding to the effect that the plaintiff was not able to determine the correct number of the lot from an inspection of the property is attacked as not supported by the evidence. It is insisted that the evidence conclusively shows that four stakes on each lot were so numbered as to plainly and clearly show the number of the lot. While there is much evidence in the record to show that such numbered stakes were on the lots at some time, and while there is some evidence that they were on the lots at the time they were inspected by the respondent, there is other evidence to the contrary, and the most that can be said in regard to these points is that they relate to a conflict in the evidence, which has been resolved by the trial court in favor of the respondent.

[4-7] The main ground relied upon as necessitating a reversal is that the respondent was guilty of laches, and that his right to recover is therefore barred. The court found that, on the same day he discovered he had been sold the wrong lot, the respondent went to the selling agents, and demanded that his agreement be corrected to cover the land he had actually bought, or that the money he had paid be refunded to him, and this finding is not attacked. The court also found that from October 8, 1925, to and including October 28, 1926, conferences and negotiations were pending and held between the parties in attempting to settle and adjust this matter, and that, when the selling agents refused to correct the agreement or repay the amount paid, the respondent then promptly gave notice of rescission and offered to return all he had received. The notice of rescission appears in the record. While these negotiations were pending, and early in January, 1926, the respondent went to see the head of the John A. Evans Corporation and told him he either wanted the lot he bought or his money back. He was told that the other lot was sold and that his money would not be returned. He was further told that he would be foolish to take the matter to court, because he would lose anyway, since they had four or five lawyers to take care of things of that sort. However, John A. Evans told him to go to the office of the John A. Evans Corporation. When he went there, he was told that, if he would give them a "60-day exclusive" on the property, he would get his money. He did this, but did not receive his money. The various findings of the court upon this subject are not attacked by appellants, but their argument is confined to the proposition that laches is shown as a matter of law. It is the general rule that a person desiring to rescind must do so promptly. Civ. Code, § 1691. If a person retains the benefits of a contract and continues to treat it as binding, he will be deemed to have waived any fraud and to have elected to affirm the contract. Cross v. Mayo, 167 Cal. 594, 140 P. 283. In this case, the respondent did not retain any benefits of the contract and did not treat the same as binding, but merely gave to the defendants, in reliance upon their own suggestions, time and opportunity in which to adjust the matter. This is especially suggestive in view of the youth and inexperience of the respondent. Whether or not a party to a contract has rescinded promptly upon the discovery of fraud is ordinarily a question to be decided by the trial court, and, if its conclusion is reasonably supported by the evidence, an appellate court will not interfere therewith. Suhr v. Lauterbach, 164 Cal. 591, 130 P. 2; Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 P. 1047. In the case of Powell v. Oak Ridge Orchards Co., 84 Cal. App. 714, 258 P. 636, 638, the court said:

"The claim of laches in rescinding the contract is also without merit. In September, 1922, which was the month following the discovery of the soil conditions, Powell went to Orange county, the residence of the defendant corporation, seeking a rescission of the contract. There, in conversation with the officers of said corporation, he offered to return everything he had received by virtue of the contract and demanded repayment to him of the money he had expended thereunder. His offer of rescission was not acted upon at that time, however, said officers informing him that his proposition would be brought before the directors of the company at its next meeting, and that as soon as a decision was reached he would be notified. After waiting vainly for a reply until February 15, 1923, he served formal notice of rescission, and, as already stated, on April 21, 1923, commenced this action. 'Where a party protests promptly on discovering that he has been defrauded in making a contract, and then enters into negotiations for a peaceable settlement, which fail, a bill for cancellation of the contract, filed within a reasonable time after such failure, is not barred by laches.' 2 Black on Rescission and Cancellation, § 544.

"Moreover, 'there is no artificial rule as to the lapse of time or circumstances which will justify the application of the doctrine' of laches (Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 P. 516), the question of whether or not a party defrauded has rescinded promptly depending upon all the circumstances of the particular case and being primarily one for the trial court to determine (French v. Freeman [191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515], supra); and if its conclusions thereon find reasonable support in the evidence the reviewing court will not interfere therewith (Suhr v. Lauterbach, 164 Cal. 591, 130 P. 2)."

Under the circumstances here existing, we are unable to say that the respondent did not use reasonable diligence in giving notice of rescission, and in beginning this action. He gave verbal notice to appellants the day discovery was made. In view of the fact that the pending negotiations, which were based upon representations that by giving them time they would get his money for him, continued until October 28, 1926, and that, when it appeared there was no use in waiting longer, a formal notice of rescission was given, we cannot say that the trial court was not justified in holding that there was no laches. The time between the formal notice of rescission and the filing of the action was not unreasonable, as has been held in many cases. Not only do the appellants appear to have been more responsible than respondent for any existing delay, but prejudice from such delay in no manner appears.

[8] It is next urged that the respondent has shown no damage, and that it does not appear that the lot referred to in the contract was not as valuable as the lot he agreed to buy. Not only is a purchaser entitled to get what he agrees to buy, but the evidence shows a marked difference between the two lots, in that a great deal more excavation would be required upon one lot than on the other, in order to build thereon, and the lot he agreed to buy had a frontage upon two streets, which fact was mainly responsible for his entering into the agreement. We think a substantial damage was shown. Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 P. 1011; Taber v. Piedmont Heights Building Co., 25 Cal. App. 222, 143 P. 319.

The judgment appealed from is amply sustained by the evidence, and we find nothing in the record that would have justified a different conclusion, except certain evidence which merely raises a conflict and which apparently was not accepted as true by the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

This appeal is taken from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants Acme Stevedore Company, a corporation, and Jack Bishop in the sum of $20,000 for personal injuries received by plaintiff.

The accident happened on June 28, 1927, near a cafeteria at the west end of pier 32 on the San Francisco water front. This pier runs in an easterly and westerly direction. Both Kraft and Bishop were employed as operators of small trucks used for transporting freight and towing small flat cars about the pier. Kraft was operating an electric truck for the Matson Navigation Company, while Bishop was operating a gasoline truck for the Acme Stevedore Company. The injuries to Kraft resulted from a collision between these trucks. On the southerly side of the pier and along the center portion thereof there was an aisle down the pier formed by piles of cased pineapple. Bishop operated his truck at a low rate of speed in a westerly direction along the pier toward the cafeteria, towing three small flat cars. He then made a horseshoe turn near the cafeteria to proceed back in an easterly direction down the pier. Prior to the accident, Kraft had been unloading cases of pineapple from his truck to a pile on the southerly side of the pier. There is a conflict in the evidence concerning the position of Kraft's truck just before the accident occurred. Bishop testified that he saw Kraft's truck just prior to making the turn, and that it was not projecting into the main aisle running down the pier. He further testified that the position of the truck was changed as he made the turn so that it projected into the main aisle. Kraft was on his truck in a position to operate it, but testified that he did not move the truck while Bishop was making the turn. Shortly before the collision, Bishop looked back to see that the small flat cars he was towing did not come in contact with persons on the pier near the cafeteria as he made the turn. At the time of the collision, Kraft's right foot was jammed between the pedals of his truck, causing his injuries.

[1] During the presentation of his case, Kraft testified that he was a baseball player. As he stated it, he was a semiprofessional. That evidence was admissible. Scally v. W. T. Garratt & Co., 11 Cal. App. 139, 145, 104 P. 325. In no place did he testify that he had a firm offer of a high salary as a baseball player.

[2] The defendants make three points, all of which attack the verdict as being excessive. They claim that one instruction given at plaintiff's request authorized the jury to go into the realm of guessing and speculating. We think not. It was one of several instructions given on cognate subjects. Reading all of them together, we cannot say the error was prejudicial. First, we quote that part of the instruction complained of, and then we set forth some other passages. "You are instructed that in determining the extent to which the earning capacity of plaintiff has been impaired by his injuries, you may take into consideration if you see fit what he has been earning in the immediate past and the probabilities of what his earnings would have been in the future if he had not received his injury." (Tr. 299.)

"* * * In fixing damages for said permanent injury, you should consider * * * whether or not it will impair the future earning capacity of the plaintiff. If you find * * * the plaintiff's injury will cease to cause pain and suffering and will not impair his earning capacity then plaintiff will be entitled to a smaller measure of damages. * * * In either case plaintiff is only entitled to the pecuniary damage actually suffered." (Tr. 298, 299.)

"The court instructs the jury that if you find that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, the measure of his recovery is what is denominated compensatory damages; that is, such sum as will compensate him for the injury he has sustained." (Tr. 296, 297.)

"* * * You should allow the plaintiff only such sum as will compensate him for the damage suffered from the injuries which were proximately caused by the negligence of the defendant. And in this regard you are instructed that you are not permitted to speculate, or surmise, as to whether or not the plaintiff has suffered any injuries as the proximate result of said accident, but that the plaintiff must establish by a preponderance of the evidence that he did actually, as the proximate result of said accident, suffer certain injuries, and it is only as to such injuries, if any, that the plaintiff proves by a preponderance of the evidence that he suffered as a proximate result of said accident that you may award him damages." (Tr. 298.) The error, claimed to be in the first instruction, is that it uses the expression "probabilities" instead of using the words "certain to result." Civ. Code, § 3283. That section is worded as follows: "Injuries Resulting or Probable After Suit Brought. Damages may be awarded, in a judicial proceeding, for detriment resulting after the commencement thereof, or certain to result in the future." But we think the error, if any, was cured by the other instructions from which we have quoted. Norton v. Houlette, 85 Cal. App. 233, 235, 258 P. 1104; Brown v. Beck, 63 Cal. App. 686, 697, 220 P. 14; Rouse v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 27 Cal. App. 772, 774, 151 P. 164; Hersperger v. Pac. Lumber Co., 4 Cal. App. 460, 467, 88 P. 587, 591; Lonnergan v. Stansbury, 164 Cal. 488, 129 P. 770. For these reasons we do not think the case at bar is to be ruled by Richman v. S. F., etc., Ry., 180 Cal. 454, 460, 181 P. 769. In making this attack the defendants, in their last brief, earnestly contend that there is a great difference between the words challenged and the expression if it had read, "* * * what he has been earning in the immediate past and what his earnings would probably have been in the future. * * *" It does not so impress us. We think the same principles which we have adverted to would apply.

[3] It will be noted that hereinabove we used the expression "the error, if any. * * *" We did so advisedly. The subject to which the instruction was addressed in the instant case was future earnings, not to bodily injuries. Now it is settled law that in this state the title of a Code section as printed in the Code is to be read with the body of the section when the section is being construed. Bettencourt v. Sheehy, 157 Cal. 698, 701, 702, 109 P. 89. When the body and title of Civil Code section 3283 are read together, and applied to future earnings as the same may be based on legal evidence theretofore introduced, the mind naturally considers the probable length of the injured man's probable life, the continuance of his health, and probable continuance of the wage rate. The Code section, title and all would seem to authorize that manner of reasoning. But we express no opinion on the point. We rest our ruling on the cases cited above.

[4] On the request of the plaintiff, the trial court instructed the jury "It is the duty of all persons so to use their property so as not to cause injury to others, and a failure to perform said duty constitutes negligence." It is not an apt expression of the law. The two words which we have italicized are small, but they limit the rest of the expression. The instruction was preceded almost immediately by another instruction worded as follows: "The court instructs you that in the case presented defendants were required to use ordinary care, by which is meant that degree of care that would be used by a person of ordinary prudence under the same or similar circumstances." Reading both instructions together, we think it can reasonably be claimed that the first one stated to the jury that the operator of property must use some care, and that the second instruction informed the jury that in the case on trial the operator was bound to use ordinary care. As so construed, the challenged instruction did not contain prejudicial error.

[5] The defendants further claim that the verdict was excessive. The verdict was high, it will be conceded; but, under the facts, it cannot at first blush be said that the verdict, in part, rests on passion or prejudice. Campanella v. Campanella, 204 Cal. 515, 523, 269 P. 433. Doctor bills, etc., amounted to $770. Before the trial and following the accident, his loss in wages amounted to $5,500. He experienced the accident, and down to the date of the trial he had undergone five operations and 190 treatments, and had been and was suffering pain, at times intense. Proper damages for the foregoing elements would greatly reduce the verdict which was in the sum of $20,000. By reason of the accident and the necessary operations, the plaintiff's right heel has been so torn or cut away that the bone protrudes, and there is no flesh to support his heel. He is compelled to wear a padded shoe to protect his heel and to walk on the ball of his right foot. Any improvement in the conditions is problematical. At the time of the trial he was twenty-four, and his expectancy was over thirty-eight years. He weighed 186 pounds, and by occupation was at times a stevedore, hoisting engineer, and baseball player. In these occupations he had the capacity to earn $3,000 a year. Sometimes he was out of work, and then his earnings were reduced. But the evidence showed that sometimes he had continuous employment for six months. The defendant asserts that the jury estimated the plaintiff's loss of earnings by assuming that he was a high-salaried baseball player. The record does not contain such evidence, and, furthermore, the record does not show that the jury based its verdict, in whole or in part, thereon.

We find no prejudicial error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: NOURSE, P. J.

SPENCE, J.

I dissent. The trial court gave the following instruction: "It is the duty of all persons so to use their property so as not to cause injury to others and a failure to perform said duty constitutes negligence." This is more than an inapt expression of the law. It is an entirely erroneous definition of negligence. It was the duty of defendants to exercise ordinary care in the use of their property so as to avoid injury to plaintiff. If they failed to exercise ordinary care under the circumstances, they were chargeable with negligence; otherwise they were not. The foregoing instruction was bound to be misleading, and would obviously tend to confirm the erroneous impression of many laymen that liability in personal injury cases is predicated upon any use of one's property causing injury to another. It not only warranted the jury in basing a finding of negligence merely upon the happening of the accident without regard to the amount of care exercised, but in effect directed such a finding, thus making the rule of negligence absolute and not relative. The fact that another instruction imposed upon defendants the duty to exercise ordinary care does not cure the error complained of. Defendants were still negligent under the foregoing instruction if they used their property in any manner so as to cause the injury.

Counsel for respondent does not attempt to justify the giving of this instruction, but cites section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, and quotes from 19 Cal. Juris. p. 747, as follows: "Thus even though an erroneous instruction is given it is not prejudicial error if there is evidence which amply supports the verdict, and it is apparent that the jury disregarded the instruction." It is not at all apparent in the present case that this instruction was disregarded. There was a conflict in the evidence relating to the issues of negligence and contributory negligence. In the instructions, the jury was given two definitions of negligence, one correct and the other incorrect. The general instructions relating to liability used the term "negligence," and it is impossible to determine upon which of the conflicting definitions of negligence the jury relied in applying these general instructions. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said that the error was not prejudicial. Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599; Hesler v. California Hospital Co., 178 Cal. 764, 174 P. 654; Quint v. Dimond, 147 Cal. 707, 82 P. 310; White v. Davis, 103 Cal. App. 531, 284 P. 1086; Alcamisi v. Market St. Ry. Co., 67 Cal. App. 710, 228 P. 410.

Aside from the other points raised by appellant, in my opinion the giving of the abovementioned instruction in itself requires a reversal.

Civ. 4084.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 17, 1931.

1. Automobiles 🔑238(1).

Bicyclist's complaint held not demurrable because not alleging that collision with motortruck occurred on public highway.

> The complaint contained the allegation that the plaintiff was riding his bicycle on a certain street which was a public highway and thoroughfare dedicated and used for travel and traffic of various kinds and nature, including the right to ride a bicycle thereon.

2. Automobiles 🔑244(1).

Evidence established that collision between truck and bicycle occurred on public highway (St. 1923, p. 519, § 21).

> It appeared, notwithstanding truck owner's evidence that his property line extended 10 feet out into traveled portion of street, that the portion of the street on which the accident occurred was at the time of the accident, and for more than 20 years prior thereto had been, used by the general public, and that the street at the point of accident had the same appearance with respect to user and travel as the remainder thereof, so that St. 1923, p. 519, § 21, defining what constitutes a "public highway," was applicable.

3. Evidence 🔑123(11).

In bicyclist's personal injury action against truck owner, truck driver's statements made after accident held inadmissible; being no part of res gestæ.

> After the accident, the truck driver made the statement that it was his fault, that he backed out of alley too fast and did not blow his horn.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1051(1).

Erroneous admission in action against truck owner of driver's statements held not prejudicial; there being other evidence tending to establish facts stated by driver.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1).

In action against truck owner, erroneous admission of driver's statement that "I know it was my fault" held not prejudicial, where owner made no contention on appeal that driver was not negligent.

Mr. Justice pro tem. TUTTLE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action for damages arising out of a collision between plaintiff, a bicyclist, and defendant's motortruck. A verdict in the sum of $3,000 was rendered for plaintiff by the jury, and the appeal is prosecuted from the judgment.

Plaintiff, a minor, was riding his bicycle along Main street, in the town of Campo Seco. The driver of defendant's truck backed out of an alley which intersected Main street, and struck plaintiff, who was severely injured.

[1] Appellant contends that the complaint does not state a cause of action, in that it is not alleged therein that the accident occurred upon a public highway. The objection is untenable. The second paragraph of the complaint alleges:

"That on the 16th day of February, 1929, at or about the hour of 2:15 o'clock p. m. of said day said plaintiff, Victor Villegas, was riding a bicycle in a southwesterly direction on Main Street, in the Town of Campo Seco, County of Calaveras, State of California, which said roadway and street is and then was a public highway and thoroughfare in the said County of Calaveras, dedicated and used for travel and traffic of various kinds and nature, including the right to ride a bicycle thereon."

The third paragraph alleges that at said time and place the driver of the truck negligently drove his truck so that it was caused to strike plaintiff, setting forth all the details.

The only possible inference which could be drawn from the pleading is that the accident occurred upon Main street.

[2] It is next contended by appellant that the evidence shows that the accident occurred upon the property of defendant, and not upon a public highway. He introduced evidence of a very unsatisfactory character, which tended to prove that defendant's property line extended ten feet out into the traveled portion of Main street; defendant being an abutting owner. It appears that the accident occurred upon the strip of property mentioned. This being the fact, it is argued that plaintiff was a trespasser, and not entitled to the benefit of the California Vehicle Act. This act, at the time of the accident and also at present, contains the following provision:

"Sec. 21. 'Public Highway.' Every highway, road, street, alley, lane, court, place, trail, drive, bridge, viaduct or trestle laid out or erected as such by the public or dedicated or abandoned to the public, or intended or used by or for the general public, except such portions thereof as are used or prepared for use by pedestrians as sidewalks. The term 'public highway' shall apply to and include driveways upon the grounds of universities, colleges, schools and institutions. The term 'public highway' shall not be deemed to include private driveways, roads or places used by the owner, his guests and those having business with the owner and not intended to be otherwise used, or otherwise used by the general public." St. 1923, p. 519.

The accident happened at a point on Main street, which was from four to ten feet out from the westerly boundary of that street, as such boundary is defined by the buildings on that side of the street. The street at this point had the same appearance, with respect to user and travel, as the remainder thereof. There was testimony that this particular portion of the street had been used in general by the public for the past twenty years, and that it was so being used at the time of the accident.

Our conclusion is that the point where the accident occurred was located in a public highway, as defined by the California Vehicle Act. All that is required by said act is that the highway be used by the general public. There was ample proof that the portion of Main street, upon which the accident occurred was, at the time of the accident, and had for some twenty years prior thereto, been used by the general public. We therefore hold that the provisions of the act in question are applicable to this case.

[3-5] The court admitted in evidence certain declarations of the employee of defendant, made after the accident, which were as follows: "I know it was my fault. I know I backed out too fast and I didn't blow a horn." Such statements constituted no part of the res gestæ, and they were incompetent and inadmissible. Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 379, 104 P. 986.

A portion of the foregoing statement was merely cumulative. There is evidence in the record from other witnesses to the effect that the driver backed out of the alley at an excessive rate of speed, and that he failed to blow his horn. As to those portions of the statement, we take the view that no prejudice resulted to defendant by reason of their erroneous admission. As to the remainder of the statement, where the driver said, "I know it was my fault," we also hold that no prejudice resulted therefrom. This is due to the fact that appellant makes no contention whatever in his briefs, nor did he contend in his oral argument before this court, that defendant's driver was not guilty of negligence. Neither is it anywhere intimated that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The only discussion of the question of negligence is that which is based upon the theory and assumption that the California Vehicle Act does not apply to the facts in this case. It is virtually conceded by appellant, and not disputed, that, if the law respecting negligence, as laid down in the Vehicle Act, is applicable, defendant's driver was negligent. This is probably due to the fact that the evidence upon this issue preponderates so strongly in favor of respondent. This ground of lack of prejudice would apply also to the entire declaration.

Other points are urged as ground for reversal, but they all involve the point which we have discussed.

The judgment is affirmed.

GREENWOOD v. GREENWOOD.

Civ. 4276.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 19, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 18, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 18, 1931.

1. Divorce ⚷167.

Where defendant's counsel obtained leave to amend cross-complaint and seek divorce, defendant could not, in action to annul divorce decree, contend that cross-complaint was not amended.

It appeared that all parties considered amendment in question as having actually been made, and, since courts have taken liberal view in matter of granting trial amendments, it would be inconsistent to take narrow view with reference to methods by which amendments can be made.

2. Divorce ⚷167.

Averments rather than prayer of cross-complaint determine jurisdiction to grant divorce, and, where allegation of desertion and other allegations gave jurisdiction, divorce decree was not void (Civ. Code, § 107).

3. Divorce ⚷167.

That cross-complaint for divorce fails to state cause of action for desertion does not render divorce decree thereon void (Civ. Code, § 107).

4. Divorce ⚿167.

That interlocutory divorce decree was void, and that defendant's counsel negligently failed to utilize available remedies, could be raised and reviewed in attack only on interlocutory, not final, decree (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

5. Judgment ⚿437.

Equity will not annul judgment at law merely for attorney's neglect or mistake, unless caused by opposite party.

6. Divorce ⚿167.

If court rendered divorce decree without having further evidence by depositions showing value of community property, decree at most was erroneous but not void, since court had jurisdiction.

7. Judgment ⚿470.

Presumption is in favor of validity of judgment.

George W. Rochester and L. W. Burdick, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Andreani, Haines, Bisher & Carrey, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice pro tem. TUTTLE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a proceeding in equity which is brought for the purpose of setting aside, vacating, and annulling interlocutory and final decrees of divorce which were entered in an action wherein appellant was defendant and respondent plaintiff. The trial court found for respondent upon all issues, holding that both of said judgments were valid. The appeal is taken from the judgment entered upon said findings.

The entire attack of appellant is directed upon the findings; it being contended that they are not supported by the evidence.

On March 4, 1924, respondent filed a complaint for divorce from appellant upon the ground of desertion. He alleged that there was no community property. On March 13, 1924, appellant filed her answer in said cause, denying all the allegations of the complaint and praying for maintenance, counsel fees, and general relief. Thereafter appellant filed a cross-complaint, alleging desertion upon the part of respondent, and praying for maintenance and a disposition of the community property. Respondent filed an answer to the cross-complaint, denying the allegations thereof.

The divorce action came on regularly for trial, and evidence was submitted by both parties. During the trial on July 2, 1925, the following discussion took place:

"Mr. Greer (Attorney for Appellant): We ask leave to amend the prayer of our first cross-complaint on this only, that where we pray for separate maintenance we pray for a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony and an interlocutory decree of divorce. The rest of the prayer with reference to the division of the property, we do not care to amend.

"The Court: The amendment may be made.

"Mr. Bishler (Attorney for Respondent): Yes, I have no objection."

At the conclusion of the case, the following colloquy took place between court and counsel:

"The Court: Then the case stands submitted on the coming of these depositions (relating to the value of the community property), which will be within 30 days, will it?

"Mr. Greer (for Appellant): Your Honor, don't see now any reason for taking the depositions as to the value of any land in Oregon. At the time this contract (for property settlement) was made, the land then held was the Tulare property.

"Mr. Neff: All right.

"Mr. Greer: And that the property will be appraised as of that date.

"Mr. Neff: That is agreeable to us."

The chief contention at said trial was the dispute over community property. Prior to the said trial the parties had entered into and signed a contract which purported to settle such dispute. Appellant attempted to show that this contract should be set aside as being unfair to her.

No further evidence was furnished the court with respect to the value of the property, within the 30 days designated, and upon October 19, 1925, the court rendered its opinion, granting a divorce to appellant. Thereafter, on October 26, 1925, the court made and entered its findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court found that the property settlement was fair, just, and equitable, and not made by or through any undue influence or false or fraudulent representations. It also found facts which constituted desertion upon the part of appellant, and that there was no community property. The property settlement was also approved, and an interlocutory decree of divorce was entered. On the 20th day of December, 1926, final judgment of divorce was made and entered.

No appeal or attack upon either of said decrees was ever made, nor any action taken by appellant, until within three days after the expiration of six months from the entry of the final decree. At that time appellant moved to set aside the final judgment under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. This motion was denied. The court finds, in the instant case and upon sufficient evidence, that the proposed findings in the divorce action were served upon the attorney for appellant on October 19, 1925.

During the trial of the instant case there was considerable testimony relating to the property settlement and the value of the property involved therein. The court found that this settlement was fair, just, and equitable, and that no fraud was practiced upon appellant in the procuring thereof. Each of these cases was tried by a different judge, and thus we have the findings of two different judges upholding the settlement. The findings in this case upon that issue are amply supported by the evidence, and this is not seriously questioned by appellant.

[1] The contention of appellant is that the interlocutory judgment was coram non judice and void. She argues that the court had no jurisdiction to grant a divorce to her; that the amendment to her pleading praying for a divorce was never actually made; that the cross-complaint did not state a cause of action on the ground of desertion, in that it did not allege desertion for the statutory period of one year; and that there was not sufficient evidence to justify a finding of desertion.

We do not believe that appellant can now be heard to say that her cross-complaint was not amended so as to pray for a divorce. Her own counsel asked leave to make the amendment, and the motion was granted by the court. No subsequent conduct of either counsel is inconsistent with the view that the amendment was made then and there. Our courts have taken a very liberal view in the matter of granting trial amendments, and it would be extremely inconsistent if we were to take a narrow and strained view with reference to methods by which such amendments can be made. The case of Kimball v. Gearhart, 12 Cal. 27, seems to hold that it is necessary to write out the amendment and attach it to the pleading. That case was decided in 1859. Since the adoption of our Codes in 1872, a much more liberal construction has been given to pleadings. The act of drafting the proposed amendment, and attaching such draft to the pleading is simply exemplifying what actually took place. In any event, we are satisfied that the facts and circumstances here clearly indicate that the amendment was deemed and considered by all parties as having actually been made.

[2, 3] There is another reason why the judgment of divorce is not void. The averments of the cross-complaint, not the prayer, decide the question of jurisdiction. Miller v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. App. 334, 210 P. 832. The cross-complaint alleges that respondent "willfully and without cause deserted and abandoned defendant and cross-complainant, and still continues to willfully and without cause desert and abandon defendant and cross-complainant." This, with the other allegations of the cross-complaint, gave jurisdiction to the trial court to grant the divorce to appellant. It is contended that the pleading does not state a cause of action because it is not alleged that the desertion continued for one year. Section 107, Civ. Code. But the failure of the cross-complaint to state a cause of action does not render a judgment rendered thereon void. Gillespie v. Fender, 180 Cal. 202, 180 P. 332.

[4, 5] The complaint in the instant case seeks equitable relief upon two grounds. One is based on the theory that the judgment is void. That question we have decided adversely to appellant's contention. The other ground is simply that the attorney for appellant was negligent in failing to avail himself of legal remedies which were at all times open to appellant. No claim is made, nor is it intimated, that the neglect of appellant's counsel was due to any act of respondent or his counsel. The interlocutory decree, though service of the same was made upon appellant's counsel, was not attacked in any manner. It is true that a motion was made to set aside the final judgment of divorce under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, but matters of the character complained of by appellant here could only be raised and reviewed in an attack upon the interlocutory decree. 9 Cal. Jur. 779. Equity will not grant relief against a judgment at law, where such judgment was obtained in consequence of the neglect, inattention, mistake, or incompetence of the attorney, unless caused by the opposite party. 34 C. J. 465. If the party seeking to set aside the judgment had a complete and adequate remedy in the same proceeding, he cannot appeal to equity for relief, where his sole ground is the neglect of his attorney, and it is not contended that the act of his opponent in any manner contributed to his predicament. Cal. Beet Sugar Co. v. Porter, 68 Cal. 369, 9 P. 313.

Appellant, as it appears from her briefs, is concerned with the granting of the decree of divorce to her, only to the extent that it interferes with her attack upon the property settlement. But, as we have pointed out, the trial court found that such settlement was fair and equitable, and she is bound by that finding. After she has had two fair trials upon this issue, she now demands a third trial. It is not difficult to explain one of the causes of the congestion of litigation in Los Angeles county.

[6] Considerable complaint is made by appellant because the court in the original case rendered a judgment without having before it further evidence in the shape of depositions relating to the value of the community property. At the most the act of the court was erroneous. It still had jurisdiction to enter the judgment. Furthermore, if appellant was prejudiced in any manner under such circumstances, the neglect and incompetence of her counsel was the sole cause thereof. We might observe that in this case appellant has changed counsel three times, and her counsel on appeal had nothing to do with the trial of the action.

[7] The case presented by appellant is absolutely devoid of equity. She cannot be permitted to charge respondent with the neglect and incompetence of her own counsel. If every judgment could be attacked upon this ground alone, the intendment and presumption in favor of the validity of a judgment would become a mere fiction.

The judgment is affirmed.

ADLER v. GRANELLI.

Civ. 7491.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 19, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⚷931(1), 1011(1).

Findings on conflicting evidence are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences will be indulged in support of findings.

2. Account stated ⚷6(2).

Where debtor receives account without making seasonable objections, account becomes account stated.

3. Account stated ⚷20(1).

What was reasonable time within which debtor receiving account must make objections to prevent account from becoming account stated was fact question.

Appeal from the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by F. Adler against Charles Granelli. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Spencer G. Prime and C. K. Bonestell, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter McGovern, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by defendant, Charles Granelli, from a judgment entered against him in the sum of $534 upon an account stated. The action was brought to recover attorney's fees for services rendered to defendant, and moneys expended for his use and benefit, by the law firm of Hubbard & Hubbard, the plaintiff's assignors. The case was tried before the court without a jury.

The complaint, among other things, alleges, and the court found: That H. R. Hubbard and Leslie L. Hubbard were attorneys and counselors at law, duly and regularly licensed to practice in all the courts of California, and were engaged in the practice of law in the city and county of San Francisco under the name and style of Hubbard & Hubbard; that they performed certain legal services for defendant at his special instance and request and for his use and benefit, and that they also expended certain moneys for the use and benefit of defendant and at his special instance and request; that on the 30th of April, 1928, the said H. R. Hubbard and Leslie L. Hubbard, as such copartners, and the said defendant, accounted together concerning the said services so rendered and the money so expended, and that on said last-mentioned date it was found and ascertained between H. R. Hubbard and Leslie L. Hubbard and defendant that there was due, owing, and payable to said H. R. Hubbard and Leslie L. Hubbard, from said defendant, Charles Granelli, the sum of $534, which said sum the said defendant then and there agreed to pay; that said defendant has not paid the same nor any part thereof, and the whole thereof is now due, owing, and payable from said defendant to this plaintiff.

[1] The sole contention made by appellant is this: "There was no acquiescence such as is required to establish an account stated by reason of failure to object within a reasonable time to the correctness of the statement sent by mail."

This contention is based upon the testimony of defendant and appellant, which was that he only received one statement through the mail from Hubbard & Hubbard, and that he objected to that statement through his then attorney, Mr. Prime. On the other hand, Mr. H. R. Hubbard testified that defendant came to his office and asked for his papers, and was told by Mr. Hubbard that the firm had a bill against him; thereupon defendant requested that the bill be sent to him and that he would pay it; that thereafter, between November 16, 1927, and April 30, 1928, eight statements of the account were sent by mail, both to defendant's home and business address, but that no communication was ever received from Mr. Granelli or his attorney, Mr. Prime, relative thereto.

Thus it will be seen that the testimony given by Mr. Hubbard is in direct conflict with that given by the defendant.

The court accepted the testimony of Mr. Hubbard as true, and found in favor of the plaintiff upon every material issue made by the pleadings. These findings of the trial court, made upon conflicting evidence, are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the findings. Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 239 P. 332.

[2, 3] It was appellant's duty, when he received the account from Hubbard & Hubbard, to have made seasonable objections thereto, if he had any. Having failed to do so, the account became an account stated and the foundation of an independent cause of action, which arose thereon whenever a reasonable time elapsed without any objection being made thereto. What was a reasonable time was a question of fact for the court to determine from all the facts and circumstances in the case. Mayberry v. Cook, 121 Cal. 588, 54 P. 95; Atkinson v. Golden Gate Tile Co., 21 Cal. App. 168, 131 P. 107; Schneider v. Oakman Consolidated Mining Co., 38 Cal. App. 338, 176 P. 177; California Bean Growers' Association v. Williams, 82 Cal. App. 434, 255 P. 751.

We find no merit whatever in the appeal.

The judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

1. Wills ⟹290.

That will is not discovered after testator's death raises inference that testator revoked will.

2. Wills ⟹290.

Evidence held sufficient to exclude inference that testator had revoked will, justifying probate of will as lost or destroyed will (Code Civ. Proc. § 1339).

> Uncontradicted testimony was to the effect that testator had will in his pocket but one week before his decease, and a contestant made admissions under oath that testator's clothing was transferred to contestant's house, but that the will which testator discussed one hour previous to his final unconsciousness was not among his effects.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Petition by Edward T. Sherer and others for the probate of the will of John H. Coolman, deceased. From a decree for Lloyd J. Taylor and others, contestants, denying probate of an alleged lost or destroyed will, proponents appeal.

CRAIG, J.

The proponents of an alleged lost or destroyed last will and testament of John H. Coolman, deceased, appeal from an order and decree denying probate of the same and directing the issuance of letters of administration.

The facts of the case are not controverted. It appears that the testator called at the offices of his counsel on November 14, 1928, and discussed the matter of altering his will, which he then had in his possession; that on the following day he again visited said offices, at which time counsel observed the will in his possession. He then suggested that he desired making "some little amendments" thereof. Two days later he contracted illness which on November 22d proved fatal. At some time between 2 o'clock p. m. and 6 o'clock p. m. of November 20th, the deceased had stated to a relative that he intended making changes in his will, and "that he was not satisfied with his will," that "he intended to make some more changes and they were to be beneficial to me." At about 7 o'clock p. m. of the same day he had passed into a coma from which he did not revive. Following his demise certain of the decedent's clothing, and his will, were missed, and subsequent search failed to reveal them. Dr. Lloyd J. Taylor, one of the three contestants, was unable to recall a conversation in which he had admitted that the clothing was taken to his home. This testimony, however, was later retracted in part by the admission that they were removed to his residence without his knowledge, and there was positive testimony from other sources that he had admitted having them in his possession and had stated "that there was nothing in the pockets." Nevertheless, it is conceded that seven days prior to his death the deceased exhibited his will, and that within a few hours before unconsciousness overcame him he appeared rational, and spoke of making alterations therein.

The trial court found: "That from the facts that the will was last seen in the possession of deceased; that he intended to make changes therein; and that said will was not in existence at the time of his death, the court finds that it is true that the alleged last will and testament was by deceased destroyed prior to his death, with the intent on his part to revoke the same." This finding is founded solely upon the presumption which arises from the fact that the will was not discovered. The court further found that it was not shown to have been fraudulently or by public calamity destroyed in the lifetime of the testator. Coolman had frequently expressed an intention to die testate, had made various wills and alterations thereof, and one week preceding his death took from his pocket the will in question. He then stated that he did not desire to change its full testamentary plan, that he "did not want to change the original document if he could help it," but would like to make "just some little amendments." For personal reasons he carried it away, intending to return it to his counsel. We think Estate of Sweetman, 185 Cal. 27, 195 P. 918, 921, decisive of the right of appellants to probate the last will and testament of John H. Coolman by introduction of the offered copy and proof of its provisions by two credible witnesses. Code Civ. Proc. § 1339. In the cited case it appeared that the testatrix had made several wills and alterations thereof; two weeks preceding her death she expressed an intention to make a different one; shortly thereafter she stated that she intended making a new will "and drop the Johnsons out"; arrangements were made to prepare a new will on the 29th of January, and on February 3d she died; unlike the facts here presented, the testatrix remarked immediately preceding her demise that she had destroyed the Johnson will. But there was no other evidence of its destruction, the witnesses had not seen it for some months, and it was not found; yet she had assured other witnesses who testified that the will would be found. Affirming a decree admitting the will to probate, our Supreme Court said: "We have therefore the simple question as to whether or not the declarations of the deceased that the will was in existence, repeated in the most solemn fashion only 3 days before her death, was sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the will was in existence at the time of her death. It seems clear that these declarations of the testatrix at least had the effect of overcoming the presumption that the will had been destroyed by her with the intention of revoking the same. With this presumption thus eliminated we have then the fact that the will was in existence 2½ months before her death. The law presumes that a thing once shown to be in existence continues in existence as long as things of that nature usually exist. * * * If we apply that presumption to the will under consideration, it is evident that without the intervention of some unusual agency it would not cease to exist in 75 days. There was no proof that any such agency destroyed the will. The trial court was therefore justified in its finding to that effect."

[1, 2] Coupled with positive denials of the testator that he intended changing the original document here in question, the record presents strong evidence which tends to exclude any fair conclusion that he intended to destroy his will or to revoke it. The uncontradicted testimony that he had it in his pocket but one week before his passing, and the admissions of a contestant under oath that the decedent's clothing was promptly transferred to his house, but that the will which Coolman discussed one hour previously to his final unconsciousness was not among his effects, must present rebuttal evidence as substantial as is usually available in such a case. In the instant case there is no evidence of any nature, aside from mere inference which has at times been dignified as a "presumption," that the offered will was not the last solemn testamentary intention and act of John H. Coolman, excepting only some slight undisclosed alteration. It has been held that "disputable inferences and presumptions, while evidence, are the weakest and most unsatisfactory evidence. They are allowed to stand not as against the facts they represent, but in lieu of proof of them. The facts being proven contrary to the presumption, no conflict arises; the presumption is simply overcome and dispelled." Savings & Loan Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 P. 922. To the same effect are Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corp., 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269; Landsrath v. Indus. Acc. Comm., 77 Cal. App. 509, 247 P. 227, and Mellor v. Rideout, 83 Cal. STOCKEL v. ELICH et al. (HAIGHT et al., Interveners).

Civ. 4193.

District Court of Appeal, Third District. California.

March 16, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 15, 1931.

1. Mortgages 🔑32(2).

Deed absolute on its face, but intended merely as security for indebtedness, constitutes mortgage, and does not actually convey title.

2. Mortgages 🔑1.

"Mortgage" is merely written contract hypothecating specific property and creating lien for security of debt (Civ. Code, § 2920).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Mortgage," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Mortgages 🔑10.

"Mortgage" is not necessarily grant of real property (Civ. Code, § 2920).

4. Logs and logging 🔑5.

Woods and forests 🔑1.

Timber, while growing, is part of realty, but, when cut, it becomes personalty, although title is not changed.

5. Mortgages 🔑132.

Under terms of mortgages covering timber land and contract for cutting such timber into ties, mortgagee held to have lien on timber and ties manufactured therefrom, and was entitled to proceeds as against attaching creditor of mortgagor (Civ. Code, §§ 2920, 2972).

> Deed of conveyance was duly executed transferring "all timber of every kind and character" as security for indebtedness, and, as part of same transaction, mortgagees executed written contract authorizing mortgagor to enter on premises and cut and manufacture timber situated thereon into ties. Contract provided that timber products manufactured should be sold or disposed of only through mortgagees, and that net proceeds received from sale should be applied to payment of outstanding indebtedness. Subsequently, mortgagees acquired another tract of timber land, and executed contract for sale of land and manufacturing of ties from timber to mortgagor. Terms of such contract were substantially similar to original contract in matter of cutting ties and right to proceeds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by Catherine Stockel against Matt Elich and another, copartners, wherein E. W. Haight and another intervened. From part of judgment adverse to them, interveners appeal.

Reversed.

H. C. Nelson, of Eureka, for appellants.

E. S. Mitchell, of Eureka, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal on the part of the interveners from that portion of a judgment in favor of plaintiff which declares that the defendant Elich was the owner of $1,493.36, the proceeds of the sale of 2,000 ties, and that plaintiff's attachment on said proceeds is valid.

For several years the interveners had been financing the defendant Elich in the manufacturing and sale of ties. The defendant Elich owned 40 acres of timber land in Humboldt county upon which he had been manufacturing ties. Elich was indebted to the interveners in the sum of $3,908.91 on account of ties previously manufactured on the said 40-acre tract. By a deed of conveyance duly executed and recorded June 4, 1928, Elich and his wife transferred to the interveners "all timber of every kind and character" which was situated on that tract of land. On that date, and as a part of the same transaction, Elich and the interveners executed a written contract authorizing Elich to enter upon the premises and cut and manufacture into ties the timber situated thereon. This contract recited that the foregoing deed of conveyance was executed as "security for the payment of the said sum of $3,908.91," together with such other sums of money as were advanced for the manufacturing of ties. The contract further provides that "all timber products manufactured from timber situated upon above described premises shall be sold or disposed of only through said first parties [interveners]; that the net proceeds received from the sale of any of the timber products from said premises shall be applied to the payment of the above-mentioned sums; * * * that this agreement shall terminate when the said sum of $3,908.91 and the interest thereon, together with such other sums as may be advanced by first parties shall have been fully paid." It was then provided that, when such sums had been fully repaid, the grantees would reconvey the property to Elich.

Lawrence L. Chapman was the owner of 80 acres of timber land in the vicinity of the above-mentioned tract. The defendant Elich had been manufacturing ties on this last-mentioned land. May 3, 1928, this 80-acre tract of land was conveyed from Chapman and wife to Haight and Mitchell. On June 4, 1928, another contract for the sale of land and the manufacturing of ties from timber on this 80-acre tract was executed by Elich and the interveners. This contract provided for sale of the 80-acre tract to Elich for the sum of $5,500 and 7 per cent. interest thereon, together with all money advanced by the interveners for the cost of manufacturing ties from the timber thereon. The contract further provides: "The party of the second part [Elich] shall cut, manufacture and remove the products with due diligence and * * * the said products shall only be sold through the parties of the first part [interveners]; * * * that the net proceeds from the sale of all timber products from above lands shall be applied to the payment of the full purchase price as stated above, together with interest thereon and all other sums advanced," for manufacturing ties. It was then provided that, upon payment of all said sums of money, the interveners would convey said 80-acre tract of land to Elich.

Pursuant to these agreements, the defendant Elich entered upon the above-mentioned tracts of land and manufactured ties. Up to the time of the transaction which is involved in this action, all ties were sold by the interveners in their own names. The proceeds of such sales were remitted to them and applied pursuant to the terms of the foregoing contracts. Mr. Haight, who personally attended to these transactions, was going away for a temporary visit. He left on April 28, 1928. Prior to this he wrote to Elich, telling him of the prospective trip and asking him to make a shipment of ties to the Southern Pacific Company. During the month of June, in the absence of Haight, Mr. Elich shipped to the Southern Pacific Company, in his own name, 3,000 ties; 1,000 of these ties belonged to another party by the name of Flickenstein; 2,000 of these ties came from the premises covered by the above-mentioned deeds and contracts. While the proceeds of the sale of these 2,000 ties, amounting to the sum of $1,493.36, remained in the possession of the Southern Pacific Company, the plaintiff brought a suit in assumpsit against Elich based on another claim, and thereupon attached the said sum of money. A third party claim to this sum of money was duly served upon the Southern Pacific Company by Haight and Mitchell. Upon proceedings duly had, a complaint in intervention was filed in the last-mentioned suit, in which pleading Haight and Mitchell claimed to be the owners and entitled to said 2,000 ties and the proceeds of sale thereof. Upon trial of the cause, the court held that the interveners were not owners or entitled to the proceeds of sale of the 2,000 ties; that the attachment on said sum of money was valid, and thereupon rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,493.36.

It seems quite evident from a construction of the foregoing deeds and contracts that the interveners held a lien upon the property, including the ties manufactured thereon, in trust for the payment of the several specified sums of money, together with all additional sums advanced to Elich for the cost of manufacturing the timber into ties. Mr. Elich testified in this regard:

"Q. Now this stuff that was shipped out, who was the bill of lading sent to? A. To Mr. Haight and Mitchell.

"Q. And to whom was the money paid? A. Mr. Haight and Mitchell.

"Q. No matter whether they placed the order or you placed the order, as a matter of selling it, the proceeds went to Haight and Mitchell? A. Yes.

"Q. Who did the money belong to? A. Them. * * *

"Q. Now those ties that were shipped, two thousand, I believe, came off out of the camp you were working? A. Yes sir.

"Q. Had you * * * paid up Haight and Mitchell everything that was owing them for money that they had advanced in those operations of yours? A. No sir.

"Q. And to whom was the proceeds from the sale of the two thousand ties that came off your claim, to be paid, who was to get the money for them? A. Mr. Mitchell and Haight.

"Q. Haight and Mitchell? A. Yes sir.

"Q. The bills of lading were sent down to them? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Were any of the ties, the two thousand ties that were shipped in June, taken off the Chapman timber? A. Yes sir. Well I am not sure, between five and six hundred ties. * * *

"Q. Did any of these ties come off of land to which the Stockels claimed ownership? A. No sir.

"Q. No question about that, is there? A. No sir. * * *

"Q. Now with reference to any ties that were on the ground out there at the time these agreements were drawn up on June 4, 1928, what arrangement if any did you have with Haight, with respect to such ties? A. No arrangements made of any kind. They bought whatever there was on the ground before we made out the agreement.

They paid for everything and it was not specified in the agreement; just our understanding, between me and Mr. Haight that everything there was * * * in the camp would belong to them.

"Q. They had paid for it all before? A. Yes sir. * * *

"Q. Who is entitled to the money from the two thousand ties from your camp? A. Mr. Haight and Mitchell." The foregoing testimony is uncontradicted.

[1-4] The respondent asserts that the foregoing instruments constitute mere mortgages upon the real property described in the deeds, and that the liens created thereby were forfeited and lost to the interveners when the timber was cut and manufactured into ties. Halleck v. Mixer, 16 Cal. 574; Herriter v. Porter, 23 Cal. 385; Moisant v. McPhee, 92 Cal. 76, 28 P. 46; 17 Cal. Jur. 735, § 41. It is claimed that, since the real owner of the land was lawfully in possession, when he cut the standing timber and manufactured it into ties, he thereby converted the timber into personal property, destroyed the interveners' lien thereon, and became the owner of the ties. 17 Cal. Jur. 869, § 157. It is true that a deed which is absolute on its face, but which is intended merely to secure an indebtedness of the grantor, is a mortgage, and does not actually convey title to the land. Moisant v. McPhee, supra. It is also true that a mortgage is merely a written contract hypothecating specific property and creating a lien for the security of a debt. Section 2920, Civ. Code; 17 Cal. Jur. 696, § 5; Pacific Fruit Exchange v. Duke, 103 Cal. App. 340, 284 P. 729. A mortgage is not necessarily a grant of real property. Adler v. Sargent, 109 Cal. 42, 49, 41 P. 799. In the case of Halleck v. Mixer, supra, Mr. Justice Field says: "Whilst the timber is growing it is a part of the realty. * * * When once cut, the character of the property is changed; it has ceased to be a part of the realty, and has become personalty, but its title is not changed. It belongs to the owner of the land as much afterwards as previously, and he may pursue it in whosoever hands it goes."

The foregoing language is used in a case involving the title to timber which had been cut from land without any contract with relation thereto. In the case of Herriter v. Porter, supra, it is said: "It is urged by the appellants, that the timber out of which the posts were made was cut on the land of Hihn and others—therefore, the posts were their property under the rule laid down in the case of Halleck v. Mixer, 16 Cal. 574. That is true, unless they were cut under some contract or agreement with the owners of the land, or with their consent—a fact which does not appear in the statement of facts agreed on."

In the case of Moisant v. McPhee, supra, the facts differ from those of the present case. In that case the title to land was conveyed to McPhee and Markle to secure the payment of a debt due from the owner, Warren, to the grantees. By consent, the owner, Warren, cut from the premises a quantity of tan bark. There was no agreement that this bark was to be sold by the grantees. Warren sold it to the plaintiff Moisant for $1,404. The grantee, McPhee, however, appropriated the bark "and converted it to his own use." The court there properly held that under such circumstances the real owner of the land held title to the bark and had a right to sell it. Judgment was rendered accordingly. It must be remembered that the tan bark in the Moisant Case was not cut pursuant to contract between the real owner of the land and the grantees upon terms which retained the absolute control of the commodity in the hands of the grantee. The present case differs from the Moisant Case in that regard. The present case comes within the suggestion quoted from the Herriter Case, supra.

[5] Assuming that the interveners in the present case merely held title to the two parcels of land in trust to secure the payment of certain specified sums, and that the deeds of conveyance were mere mortgages, still Elich acquired no title to the manufactured ties, for he cut them under a specific contract which entitled the interveners to the proceeds therefrom. Even though Elich be conceded to be the real owner of the land, he does not claim any title to the ties. He frankly admits they belonged to the interveners. The two deeds and the accompanying contracts must be construed together to determine the right to the proceeds from the sale of the ties. The ties were not cut by the owner with a claim of title thereto. They were cut pursuant to the terms of the contracts which became a part of the instruments of conveyance of title to the land, which the law construes to be mere mortgages. The contracts were then a part of the terms and conditions of the mortgage. These instruments created a lien upon both the standing timber and the manufactured ties. By the terms of these contracts, the title to the proceeds from the sale of ties was retained by the interveners. Moreover, it does not appear that Elich ever did own the Chapman 80-acre tract from which at least 500 of the ties in controversy were cut. Certainly Elich could acquire no title to ties cut from this tract under any circumstances. He claims no such right or title.

Assuming that the deeds alone were mere mortgages, and that severance of the timber from the freehold removed the lien upon the realty (17 Cal. Jur. 869, § 157), still a lien upon the ties which were manufactured from the timber was retained by virtue of the terms of the contracts accompanying the deeds. This was the evident intent of the contracting parties. Nor is the lien lost by virtue of converting the timber into ties. Section 2972 of the Civil Code provides: "The lien of a mortgage on a growing crop continues on the crop after severance, whether remaining in its original state or converted into another product, so long as the same remains on the land of mortgagor."

Evidently the combined instruments which were executed in the present case were intended to create a lien upon the ties and the proceeds of sale thereof by express contract.

"A party may, by manifest intent and agreement, create a security, charge or claim in the nature of a lien on real as well as on personal property whereof he is the owner or in possession, which a court of equity will enforce against him, and volunteers or claimants under him with notice of the agreement. * * * If a transaction resolve itself into a security, whatever may be its form, and whatever name the parties may choose to give it, it is in equity, a lien." 17 R. C. L. 604, § 13.

In 37 C. J. p. 315, § 19, it is said: "As a general rule any express executory contract in writing, based upon a valuable and adequate consideration, whereby one party clearly indicates an intention to charge or appropriate some particular property, real or personal, therein described or identified, as security for a debt or other obligation, * * * creates an equitable lien upon the property * * * in the hands, not only of the original contractor, but also of his heirs, personal representatives, assigns, or purchasers or encumbrancers with notice."

Section 28, page 321, of the last-mentioned authority further says: "An equitable lien for advances may exist where advancements of money or funds are made on the faith of certain property, real or personal, under an agreement or circumstances showing that it was the intention of the parties to pledge such property as security for the advancements, provided the specific property or its proceeds on which the advancements were invested can be traced or identified."

[6] The defendant Elich had divested himself of all title to the ties in question by the express provisions of the contracts with the interveners. The deeds of conveyance were sufficient notice that he was not the owner. In the shipment of this particular consignment of ties to the Southern Pacific Company, Elich became a mere agent for the interveners. He shipped them at the written request of Mr. Haight. This vested him with no title to the ties. The attaching creditor could acquire no greater title than Elich possessed. It follows that the findings and judgment of the court, to the effect that Elich was the owner of the ties and the proceeds of sale thereof, is erroneous.

The judgment is reversed.

W. A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

Plaintiff commenced an action against defendant, the nature of which is not disclosed by the record. (Cal. App.) 296 P. 909. The defendant responded by a cross-complaint, the second cause of action in which is involved in this appeal; it having been stipulated by the parties that the issues thereof should be tried and determined separately and independently of all other issues and judgment entered accordingly, which judgment it was further agreed should "be subject to motion and appeal as though entered in an independent action between the parties." By stipulation the cause thus framed was referred to a referee, whose findings were adopted by the court and judgment rendered in favor of cross-complainant in the sum of $2,470.21 and costs amounting to $80. The appeal is from the judgment and comes to us upon the judgment roll alone.

[1-4] But one ground is urged by appellant as a reason for reversal. It is that "the judgment is contrary to the findings in that it is apparent that $986.00 of the judgment is for and on account of an alleged oral contract in derogation of the written contract of the parties." In our consideration of an appeal from the judgment roll only, we cannot consider either the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings or whether errors were committed in the admission or rejection of testimony. Dalton v. Gore, 88 Cal. App. 554, 263 P. 844. The cross-complaint (second cause of action) alleged that cross-complainant advanced and paid out for cross-defendant at his request the sum of $4,484, and that, under the provisions of a contract pleaded in the first cause of action, the cross-complainant had become indebted to cross-defendant in the sum of $1,744, all of which was itemized by a bill of particulars attached to the cross-complaint, and that the difference between the two amounts, or $2,740, was due and owing the cross-complainant. In effect, then, the cross-action is one for money laid out and expended for cross-defendant at his special instance and request. The contract which it is said was varied by an oral contract was a lease of land for agricultural purposes, the rental thereof to be paid by a share of the crop, and which provided for the planting of the entire tract to trees and the maintenance thereof for five years, and provided further that the land might be sold and the proceeds divided. There are further allegations in the second cause of action incorporated by reference to paragraphs in the preceding count to the effect that the contract did not completely and fully cover the entire agreement between the parties, but was silent concerning certain features, and also it was set forth in substance that the contract was in fact altered by an executed oral agreement. We have no way of determining without the complete record before us whether the testimony supporting the items of account related to an executed oral agreement or were outside of and different from the original contract. We must indulge the presumption that the evidence is sufficient to warrant their allowance in the findings. Dalton v. Gore, supra. The findings establish a stipulation by the parties for the allowance to cross-complainant of all of the items of his account except the sum of $988.50 and the allowance to cross-defendant of the sum of $2,013.79. It is then found that as to the items constituting the amount of $988.50, that they "were and are proper charges against the plaintiff and cross-defendant, and the defendant and cross-complainant is entitled to credit therefor and to recover the same in this action." The report of the referee also says that the written contract was entirely silent upon the subject comprehended by a collateral agreement, and that the parties themselves put such construction upon the contract in practice. While it is true that the findings should have been more definite and specific to the effect that the sum of $988.50 had been laid out and expended by the cross-complainant for the cross-defendant, nevertheless, following the stipulation of the parties as they do, we think the only just construction to put upon them is that this sum was also laid out for defendant's benefit, and, as thus read, the findings clearly support the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

CONREY, P. J.

By information containing twelve separate counts, defendant was charged with the crime of grand theft, committed at various times, of which the first date is July 1, 1927, and the latest is October 28, 1928. While the case was on trial counts 6 and 7 were dismissed by the court. On counts 4 and 12 there was a verdict of not guilty. The convictions are on the remaining eight counts. The defendant appeals from the judgment of conviction, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The first count of the information charges that on July 1, 1927, the defendant unlawfully took away $2,700 of the personal property of one Clifford R. Dabney. (The other counts on which the defendant was convicted are of like tenor except as to dates and amounts of money taken.)

According to the testimony of the witness Dabney, he became acquainted with the defendant at the city of Los Angeles about December 1, 1924. Between that time and the times of the several payments of money made by him to the defendant, sundry representations of fact were made to him by the defendant in a series of conversations. In those conversations she informed him that she had written a book entitled "The Great Sixth Seal," or "The Lamb's Book of Life"; that this book contained various mysteries of science and secrets of life and death; the secret of how to raise the dead; the secret of locating gold and precious jewels and all the hidden treasures of the earth; that it contained the lost measurements of Solomon and Noah, by which all precious minerals of the earth could be located; that it contained the secret of radioing from planet to planet and from this earth to other planets; that she and her daughter Ruth Wieland knew all these secrets and that they had been revealed to her by the angel Gabriel and the angel Michael; that the work would be finished in February, 1925; and that it took a certain amount of money, around $5,000, to get everything in readiness so that the Sixth Seal could be printed. There are many further details of these representations, which we need not set forth at length. The witness testified that the defendant asked him for money to complete this work and that he gave her sums of money, varying in amounts, over an extended period of time; that in contributing these moneys he had relied upon and believed these various representations made to him by the defendant; that from time to time she had set the dates when "The Great Sixth Seal" would be completed, but they did not come about and defendant represented that this would require more time and would require more money; that he gave the defendant $2,700 on the first day of July, 1927; that he was commanded to pay the money "to make a concord" for Bessie Mosier; that "Bessie Mosier was to make a concord, which concord was to be the finished concord before another date was set for the finished work, for everything to come about—for another date to be set so everything could come about so the Sixth Seal could be published." Other witnesses testified to similar representations made by the defendant, and payments made by said Clifford R. Dabney to the defendant, as well as payments of money made by some of said witnesses to the defendant. Evidence was introduced showing that said book, The Great Sixth Seal, was never published. Other circumstances were shown in evidence, from which an inference might fairly be drawn not only that the representations made by the defendant to the plaintiff were untrue, but also that in fact she knew that they were untrue, and that she knowingly made such false representations for the purpose of imposing upon the credulity of Dabney in order to obtain his money.

During the progress of these affairs an association of the followers of the defendant was formed, under the name of The Divine Order of the Royal Arms of the Great Eleven; during the year 1926 land was purchased at a place referred to as the Santa Susanna hills, in Ventura county; buildings were erected, and the association established there a community home occupied by the members of the order. A considerable amount of the money furnished by Dabney went into the improvement of this property and for other expenses of the community. It was the theory of the defendant, in support of which she introduced evidence, that the defendant in good faith was establishing two religious societies ("The Divine Order of the Royal Arms of the Great Eleven" and "The Church of the Divine Science of Joshua, the Branch, the Headstone of the Corner"), of which Dabney and others became members, and that the moneys paid by Dabney were merely contributions to the funds of these associations in which the defendant and said Dabney and the other members of the societies were alike and in good faith believers.

The grounds of appeal on which appellant relies are stated in seventeen propositions. We shall use the numbers as given in the brief for appellant, but shall consider them in a different order.

[1] Point XVIII. That the verdict is not supported by the evidence. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict of conviction on each of the several counts. The representations made, and Dabney's reliance thereon in paying money to defendant, are not seriously controverted facts. The real defense was that defendant in good faith believed in those representations, and did not make them with intent to deceive and defraud. The jury having determined that branch of the inquiry against defendant, and there being evidence of a substantial nature to justify that decision, the conviction must be sustained unless there were, in the trial, prejudicial errors which deprived defendant of a fair trial and so caused a miscarriage of justice.

Point XXI. That the offenses were not proved to have been committed within the county of Los Angeles. This contention is without merit. Pen. Code, § 781; People v. Bocchio, 80 Cal. App. 138, 144, 251 P. 672.

[2] Points II to XV. These are assignments of error by the court in refusing to give to the jury instructions requested by the defendant. In the brief of appellant, these several refused instructions are referred to by description, without quotation of them and (except under point II), without stating where they may be found in the record. In only two instances (points II and III) is it asserted that the law on the same subject was not properly covered in other instructions which were given to the jury. Therefore, we shall assume that these matters were so covered, by correct statements of law in the instructions given to the jury. This assumption is reenforced by the facts concerning these instructions as set forth in the brief for respondent, and also by the fact that on reading the entire record of instructions given they appear to constitute a very complete and fair statement of the law applicable to the case.

[3] As to points II and III it is asserted by appellant that the court did not in its other instructions give any correct statement of the law on the subjects of those instructions. The requested instruction discussed under point II is shown at page 78 of the clerk's transcript. The same language, with unimportant variations, was used in other instructions given to the jury. Clerk's Transcript, pp. 99 and 109.

The requested instruction discussed under point III reads as follows:

"Evidence has been offered tending to prove that the money or property contributed by the complaining witnesses was used to pay living expenses of the various members of the so-called Divine Order Of The Royal Arms Of The Great Eleven, including the personal expenses of the complaining witnesses as members thereof. You are instructed that if you find this to be a fact and that such money or property was not used to enrich the defendant or diverted to her personal gain, you are to consider such facts in determining whether or not there was an intent to defraud the complaining witnesses on the part of defendant and if you further find that the complaining witnesses knew the purpose for which their contributions were to be used and that they were actually used for that purpose, then no offense is shown to have been committed and it will be your duty to find the defendant not guilty as to each and every count of the information."

We are of the opinion that this requested instruction is correct, and in view of the evidence referred to therein the defendant was entitled to have such instruction given to the jury. It follows that the refusal of the court to give this instruction was an error, unless an equivalent of the requested instruction was given. Appellant asserts that this was not done. In reply the Attorney General has quoted certain instructions given, but they do not appear to give the defendant the full benefit of the rule stated in the requested instruction.

[4] Point XVI. That the court erred in permitting the introduction of evidence of a conversation between the defendant and one Eleanor Sandrosky, concerning one

Sammy Rizzio. Mrs. Sandrosky testified that she and her husband conducted a drug store in the city of Los Angeles; that in July, 1924, the defendant came to her drug store and asked her to come to Mrs. Blackburn's residence in Los Angeles; that the witness complied with this request; that the defendant at her residence had a large number of manuscripts which she said were a part of the Great Sixth Seal. Among other things, the witness said: "She told me to raise up my right hand and repeat after her, 'I swear to the living God and by all that is holy and the Holy Ghost that I will not reveal what is told me,' so I did. Then Mrs. Blackburn stated, she says, 'Now, prepare yourself, as this is going to be terrible.' She says, 'The angel commanded that I kill Sammy Rizzio and you supply me with poison.'" The testimony further shows that Rizzio was the husband of Ruth Wieland, the defendant's daughter. The witness further testified that in the month of August, 1924, and at the same place, the defendant renewed her request for a poison and told her "To be sure it is the real thing." The witness said that she did not give Mrs. Blackburn any poison, but gave her some colored water.

"Q. When was the date of the last conversation you had with Mrs. Blackburn about Sammy Rizzio? A. It was on a Sunday, the last time I ever seen Sammy Rizzio.

"Q. That was the last time you ever saw him? A. Yes, sir. The first Sunday in August of 1924."

It will be noted that these conversations with the druggist took place several months before defendant became acquainted with Clifford R. Dabney. In so far as this evidence related to the proposed use of poison, we agree with counsel for appellant when in his brief he says: "It was not germane to any issue in this case; did not tend to prove or disprove any material issues; it was not shown to have ever been connected in any way with the complaining witness, Clifford R. Dabney, or that he ever heard or knew of any such conversation; it was far too remote to have had any causal connection with any act or omission of the defendant May Otis Blackburn in the summer of 1927, three years later, that was the cause or a cause of the complaining witness' parting with any money or property, it did not constitute a representation and was clearly incompetent for any purpose in the case on trial."

It is urged by respondent that the objections made to the admission of the foregoing testimony, with reference to poison to be used to bring about the death of Rizzio, were not made in sufficient form or substance to authorize appellant now to complain of the admission of such testimony. We have examined the objections and the rulings thereon, and we think that they were sufficient and were made at a proper time to advise the court of the objections and the grounds thereof.

[5] Point XVII. One W. P. Rhoades was among the followers of defendant and with him was his daughter Willa Rhoades, a sixteen year old girl. This daughter died on the 1st day of January, 1925, at the home of Rhoades in Los Angeles. He testified that the defendant instructed him to prepare the body and to keep it for the resurrection, and that in accordance with these instructions the body was kept in salt packs and ice. Again the witness said:

"Q. Did she say that she was going to raise the body? A. Well, if I remember right she said she could."

And further on he said:

"Q. Well, she never at any time stated to you that she then had the power to raise the dead or resurrect the dead, did she? A. No.

"Q. But she did state that after the Passover and the resurrection that they would then be able to raise the dead; is that what she said? A. Yes, sir."

It was further shown by the evidence that after fourteen months the body was finally buried in a cemetery and that surrounding it the bodies of seven dogs were buried; that said dogs were to have some part in the work of resurrection. It is not denied that sufficient and timely objections were made to the testimony concerning these transactions. The death of Miss Rhoades occurred at a date near the time when Dabney first became acquainted with the defendant, but there is no evidence that the statements made by the defendant concerning Miss Rhoades were made to Dabney, or in his presence, or that he ever heard of them. Dabney testified that he did not know when Willa Rhoades died or what was done with her body after her death, and that he could not remember that he had ever had any conversation with the defendant concerning the body of that young woman. All of the testimony on that subject was improperly admitted.

The issue concerning the guilt or innocence of the defendant of the crime of grand larceny in obtaining said sums of money from Dabney, and appellant's defense thereto, turned largely upon the question of good faith and actual belief of the defendant in the truth of the representations made to Dabney, and which induced Dabney to pay over the money. There was substantial evidence in favor of the prosecution, but also there was substantial evidence in favor of the defendant upon that issue. Under this condition of the case it becomes clear that the evidence in relation to Rizzio, and concerning the death of Miss Rhoades and the subsequent transactions in that connection, was extremely prejudicial to the defendant. There is a reasonable probability that without the creation of such prejudice in the minds of the jury as was likely to be created by this evidence, the jury would not have been satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was guilty of willful fraud and deception in making the representations to Dabney upon which he relied in paying money to defendant. It matters not how absurd the faith of the defendant and her followers may seem to be, if in good faith she believed in the cult or creed upon which she was founding this new society, and in the truth of the said representations. Defendant had the same right to organize a society based upon that faith, that her followers had to join with her in creating the society and establishing the community, provided only that they did not conspire together for some purpose prohibited by law. And if for the purposes of such society they chose to invest their money, that was no crime against the state. In presenting her defense to the charge that by willfully false representations she had obtained the moneys received by her from Clifford R. Dabney, the defendant was entitled to the benefit of an unprejudiced jury. Such right is not secure, where evidence tending to degrade the defendant, but not tending to prove the facts relied upon to establish her guilt, has been placed before the jury. And when, as here, it is reasonably probable that the erroneous admission of evidence has created a prejudice which led to a verdict which otherwise might not have been rendered, the judgment of conviction should not be allowed to stand.

The judgment, and the order denying motion for new trial, are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Anne Rowe against Leonard Rennick. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Joseph M. Raines, of Fairfield, and Theodore W. Chester, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Sapiro & Hayes, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendant in the sum of $10,800, for and on account of personal injuries suffered in an automobile collision alleged to be due to the negligence of the defendant. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The complaint alleges that on or about the 17th day of March, 1929, the plaintiff was riding in a certain automobile which was being driven in a southerly direction along the state highway running between the towns of Fairfield and Cordelia, in the county of Solano; that on the same day the defendant was driving an automobile in a general northerly direction along the same highway; that the defendant so carelessly, negligently, and unlawfully drove and operated his automobile as to cause the same to collide with the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding, thereby causing the plaintiff serious personal injuries, which injuries were alleged to be as follows: A fracture and dislocation of the coccyx; a fracture of the fifth lumbar vertebra on the right side in the lamina; and severe bruises of the body and legs. The complaint further alleges that by reason of such injuries plaintiff has been unable to attend to her ordinary duties as housewife, etc., has employed doctors, has incurred expenses, etc. The complaint also contains a second cause of action wherein it is alleged that, at the time the defendant was driving his automobile in a general northerly direction along the highway referred to, the defendant was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, and so carelessly and negligently operated and drove his automobile as to cause the same to collide with the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding, causing the personal injuries set forth herein. The answer of the defendant denies that he carelessly, negligently, or unlawfully drove his automobile, or caused the same to collide with an automobile in which the plaintiff was riding; denies that the plaintiff has suffered the injuries alleged in her complaint, and likewise denies that at the time of the collision the defendant was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, in any degree whatsoever; and further denies the allegations set forth in plaintiff's second cause of action that he operated his automobile in a careless or negligent or unlawful manner.

Upon this appeal the appellant alleges three reasons why the judgment should be reversed: (1) That the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to prove the facts and circumstances surrounding and attendant upon the collision; (2) that the court erred in the admission of testimony, and that counsel for the plaintiff was guilty of misconduct prejudicial to the defendant; and (3) that the judgment is excessive.

After the jury had been impaneled, and, before any opening statement had been made, counsel for the defendant made the following statement: "Mr. Raines: Your Honor, before counsel proceeds, I think it is now in order for the defendant, under the conditions here, to make a statement as to his position, that is, as to the position of the defendant Rennick, so that it will expedite the matter and clarify the issues to be presented to the jury in this case. The defendant, of course, is charged with negligence; we are admitting, what we call admitting, liability in this action; we are admitting responsibility for the accident itself, which, under the conditions, will limit the question to go to the jury as to the amount of damages to be awarded the plaintiff. I make this statement at this time so that this may guide counsel and ourselves in making the statement and the conduct of the case itself." Following this admission on the part of the defendant, counsel for the plaintiff made an opening statement detailing the facts and circumstances of the collision, and then introduced testimony to prove the facts and circumstances as outlined in the opening statement. To all of these matters the defendant interposed timely and appropriate objections, which the court overruled.

While the argument of counsel for appellant is confined to the second error alleged, to wit, the admission of certain testimony, it is necessary, in the consideration thereof, to determine whether, under the state of the pleadings, the plaintiff in this case was entitled to introduce testimony as to the facts and circumstances constituting the grounds upon which it sought to charge the defendant with liability for the injuries suffered by the plaintiff.

[1] It will be noted that the defendant did not admit the facts and circumstances resulting in the collision. The admission is only, in the language of counsel, "what we call admitting liability in this action; we are admitting responsibility for the accident itself." This, under the settled law of this state, does not preclude the plaintiff from introducing testimony to substantiate the allegations in the complaint.

In the case of Martin v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 203 Cal. 291, 264 P. 246, 249, the defendant attempted, by an admission, to narrow the issues to the simple question of the amount of damages to be awarded, and made there, just as we have here, a limited admission of responsibility. The Martin Case, however, presented a much broader question than that tendered upon this appeal. This will appear by a reference to the Martin Case as reported in (Cal. App.) 255 P. 284, where the facts contained in the transcript are set forth at length. There, the court permitted the testimony to be admitted detailing the facts and circumstances of previous acts of negligence, extending over a considerable period of time. This court held the admission of such testimony to be erroneous. In the hearing had in the same case by the Supreme Court it appears that a majority of the court agreed with the holding of this court as to the error in the admission of such extraneous matters, but it also held that the admission of such testimony was not of such a prejudicial character as to warrant a reversal, as judgment only could, under the circumstances of the case, go in favor of the plaintiff. What is said by the Supreme Court in the Martin Case, supra, however, is directly in point in this case, where only the circumstances surrounding the immediate act of negligence were testified to by the witnesses. We quote from the opinion the following: "Indeed, it never has been the law that it was or could be error to prove even admitted allegations of the pleadings if the patience of the trial court would permit it. 'It does not lie in the power of one party, however, to prevent the introduction of relevant evidence by admitting in general terms the fact which such evidence tends to prove, if the Presiding Justice in his discretion deems it proper to receive it. Parties, as a general rule, are entitled to prove the essential facts, to present to the jury a picture of the events relied on. To substitute for such a picture a naked admission might have the effect to rob the evidence of much of its fair and legitimate weight. No exception lies to the admission of relevant evidence under such circumstances.' 26 R. C. L. § 40, p. 1036; Dunning v. Maine Cent. Ry. Co., 91 Me. 87, 64 Am. St. Rep. 208, 39 A. 352. The fact that the evidence admitted might, as an incidental feature thereof, be inflammatory or have a tendency to unduly arouse the jury does not render such evidence inadmissible. In Mohn v. Tingley 191 Cal. 470, 491, 217 P. 733, 742, it is said: 'The chief objection to all the evidence of which complaint is made is that it served to stir up the prejudice of the jury and arouse sympathy in respondent's favor. But the evidence being admissible, its effect upon the jury would furnish no reason for its rejection.' Likewise no prejudicial error can be committed by reading the pleadings to the jury, even though the legal effect of them has been admitted. Knight v. Russ, 77 Cal. 410, 414, 19 P. 698. We therefore hold that the said attempt of counsel to limit the proof was abortive and the trial court committed no error in its rulings in respect thereto." To the same effect we may cite the following: Jones v. Allen (C. C. A.) 85 F. 523; Wigmore on Evidence (2d Ed.) vol. 5, p. 607, § 2591; People v. Fredericks, 106 Cal. 554, 39 P. 944; Eesley Light & Power Co. v. Commonwealth Power Co., 172 Mich. 78, 137 N. W. 663; Thomson v. Carruth, 218 Mass. 524, 106 N. E. 159.

With the holding of these cases in view, we may now consider the testimony alleged to be prejudicial. A witness on the part of the plaintiff testified that he had a conversation with the defendant immediately after the collision, a considerable portion of which is confessedly immaterial, and we will quote only that portion to which appellant's argument is directed:

"I asked him his name (referring to the defendant); he said 'J. L. Doaks.'

"Q. Did you have any further conversation with him? A. Well, yes, I did.

"Q. Well, what else, if anything, was said if anything, between you and the occupant of the car (referring to the defendant)? A. He said, 'I'm in a hell of a hole'; and I said, 'I know you are.' A. He said, 'I'm drunk and I know I'm drunk; I don't care about anything. Is the baby all right?' (Defendant looking up and seeing the baby.) I said, 'The baby is all right'; and then I asked him where he lived, and got no answer.

"Q. Anything else said? A. He said, 'Don't worry, everything is all right. I got 100,000. or 200,000. dollars insurance, and you don't have to worry about insurance; I will take care of everything; but is the baby all right?' "

Upon motion of defendant the court struck out the answer in so far as it related to insurance, and directed the jury to disregard the same. The witness further testified as to the intoxicated condition of the defendant, which was corroborated by other witnesses. The admission of the answer of the defendant is assigned as prejudicial error, and the eliciting of the same as misconduct on the part of counsel for the plaintiff, necessitating a reversal of the judgment.

[2] A number of cases have had to do with testimony disclosing the fact of insurance. Before considering these cases we may call attention, very properly, to the character of the answer made by the defendant that he had $100,000 or $200,000 insurance, as being but the vaporings of a drunken mind, and not a statement of any facts whatever. Even if it be assumed, which seems to us incredible, that the defendant was insured to the amount of $100,000 or $200,000, as he stated, the question still remains whether his answer, elicited in the manner in which it was, constituted prejudicial error, irrespective of the order of the court striking it out and directing the jury to disregard the same.

This court has had to do recently with several cases involving reference to insurance. In Loggie v. Interstate Transit Co. (Cal. App.) 291 P. 618, 619, it appears that counsel for one of the parties, on cross-examination, asked the question relating to insurance. The objection thereto, being sustained by the court, was followed by this statement: "Then for the purpose of the record, if the court please, we desire to make the offer to prove that Mr. Loggie did carry a policy of collision insurance on his automobile, which policy was paid to him for the damage to his automobile, and we make the offer at this time to make that proof." The court sustained the objection to the statement of counsel, and, upon motion therefor, granted a new trial on the grounds of the misconduct of counsel in bringing before the jury the question of insurance. In the opinion written by Presiding Justice Finch, a number of cases are referred to where such testimony has been held inadmissible, and also where the efforts of counsel to introduce such matters before the jury were held misconduct and prejudicial error. The opinion just referred to also sets forth the fact that the measure of the influence of such conduct upon the jury was primarily for the trial court, and, if the trial court was of the opinion that the verdict had been influenced thereby, an appellate court would not hold to the contrary, and the order of the trial court granting a new trial was affirmed.

In the case of Squires v. Riffe et al. (Cal. Sup.) 295 P. 517, 519 (see, also, Id. [Cal. App.] 287 P. 360), this court, in an opinion written by Presiding Justice Finch, and later adopted by the Supreme Court, held that admitting testimony that an automobile owner stated that she had liability insurance constituted error. A significant portion of the opinion in that case is pertinent here, and controlling: "Referring to proof of a settlement disclosing 'the fact that the defendant was indemnified by a policy of insurance,' it is there said: 'The evidence of the settlement, alone, not connected up with any act or admission of the defendant, and concerning which he had nothing to do, was clearly inadmissible in evidence. The error in admitting it might not in and of itself require a reversal, but, coupled with the avowed purpose and successful attempt of plaintiff's counsel to get before the jury, not only the fact of the settlement, but also that the settlement was made by the insurance carrier of the defendant, puts the case in a position where section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution will not save the judgment. The natural tendency of a line of examination that suggests to the jury that the defendant is indemnified against any judgment for damages against him is highly prejudicial to his rights, especially in a closely balanced case where the evidence otherwise would be easily sufficient on appeal to support a verdict either for the plaintiff or for the defendant. Such attempts on the part of counsel have frequently been held to be improper and prejudicial. * * * From an examination of the record in this case it is impossible for us to state that the jury would not have found a different verdict had the objectionable examination not taken place and the evidence not been admitted.'" This quotation was taken from the case of Citti v. Bava, 204 Cal. 136, 266 P. 954.

In the case at bar, from an examination of the record, we find that the jury could not, consistently with their oaths, have rendered any verdict for the defendant. It is not a question of where the testimony is evenly balanced, but one where it is only a question of how much.

In the case of Bach et al. v. C. Swanston & Son, 286 P. 1097, 1100, this court had under consideration an objection to testimony which disclosed the fact of liability insurance, and it was there said: "There is abundant authority to the effect that efforts of plaintiff's counsel to get before the jury the facts that defendant is insured against loss is prejudicial and where the evidence is closely balanced, justifies a reversal. However, in this case we do not feel that such a drastic result should follow, first, because the inference is not clear that the purpose in making said remarks was to get before the jury the fact that appellants were insured or that the jury so interpreted the said remarks, next, because the court promptly instructed the jury to disregard them, and, lastly, because the evidence in this case, upon the issues involved, is by no means equally balanced, but, on the contrary, largely preponderates in favor of respondents." This of course is true of the instant case.

In the case of Symons v. Wooden et al., 97 Cal. App. 39, 274 P. 987, it appears that, immediately after an automobile collision, the defendant made the following statement: "Don't pay any of the damages, we are carrying insurance, we are fully protected, don't pay the repair bill, present your bill to the surety company, it will be paid." This was stricken out by the court, and the jury directed not to consider the same. Further on, counsel in his argument claimed that this statement was material. We quote as follows from the opinion: "In his argument to the jury, counsel for plaintiffs stated that Hanby's statement was material as an admission against interest. The decisions support this contention." Lahti v. McMenamin, 204 Cal. 415, 268 P. 644; Dullanty v. Smith, 203 Cal. 621, 265 P. 814; McPhee v. Lavin, 183 Cal. 264, 191 P. 23, 25. In the case of McPhee v. Lavin, supra, the alleged error of disclosing the fact of insurance was before the Supreme Court, and there, as here, was connected with an admission of liability, and the court held the admission of such testimony proper. We quote from the opinion: "The errors of law assigned upon admission of testimony over defendant's objections and motions to strike, so far as in any way suggestive of prejudice, arise upon the admission in evidence, as part of a conversation had with defendant, of defendant's declaration to plaintiff, immediately after the collision that he carried accident insurance that would provide for plaintiff if he had suffered injury. As this was admitted as tending to show an acknowledgment of responsibility by defendant for the accident, we think it was proper evidence." See, also, the case of Potter v. Driver, 97 Cal. App. 311, 275 P. 526, 529, where this court held that testimony showing insurance, being connected with an answer tending to establish the defendant's acknowledgment of responsibility, was admissible.

[3, 4] A number of other cases cited by counsel for respondent might be reviewed showing that, where the fact of insurance is disclosed in an answer, coupled with an acknowledgment of liability, prejudicial error cannot be assigned, but the authorities which we have heretofore cited we think sufficient to establish the following rules: First, that where the answer disclosing the insurance is inextricably coupled with an acknowledgment of liability, the answer is admissible; second, that, where it appears from the testimony in the record that no verdict could have been rendered for the defendant, the admission of testimony relative to insurance is not alone sufficient to authorize a reversal of the judgment. It must further appear that the judgment returned was the result of passion or prejudice. This involves the third assignment of error, to wit, that the verdict is excessive.

In the case of Potter v. Driver, supra, this court quoted from Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513, the rule to be followed in determining whether damages are excessive, to wit: "That it is only where the verdict is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts, as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong presumption that it is based on prejudice or passion rather than sober judgment, that the judge is at liberty to interpose his judgment as against that of the jury." Citing Martin v. Shea, 182 Cal. 130, 187 P. 23; Grant v. L. A. Transfer Co., 45 Cal. App. 731, 188 P. 294; Anderson v. S. F. Oakland Railways, 61 Cal. App. 21, 214 P. 289.

[5, 6] That the jury may have erred in judgment, or awarded damages in a greater sum than would have been fixed by an appellate court, furnishes no legal reason for a reversal of the judgment. The fixing of the amount of damages to be awarded an injured person rests primarily upon the everyday experience and common judgment of the jury, dependent upon the circumstances of the particular case involved, subject to the revision and determination of the trial judge who has had the opportunity, as well as the jury, to learn all the facts at firsthand, and the responsibility resting upon the trial judge cannot be shifted to an appellate court unless the award is so great and so disproportionate to the injuries suffered as to clearly show the verdict to be a result of something other than a proper consideration of the testimony in the case—there must be a showing of passion, prejudice, or other undue influence. As we have shown, the record contains no testimony that should not have been submitted to the jury. The rulings of the trial court appear to be wholly unobjectionable. We are presented, really, with the simple question of the amount of the verdict in a case where liability stands confessed.

Is the verdict so excessive as to shock the conscience and lead us to the conclusion that it is not fairly supported? The record shows that the plaintiff in this case was a married woman of about 26 years of age, the mother of one child; that at the time of the collision the plaintiff was hurled back and forth in the automobile, suffered a fractured coccyx (the coccyx being the last segment of the spine), a fracture of the lamina of the lower lumbar vertebra. As a result of the injuries, respondent suffered much pain, and continued to suffer pain up to the time of the trial. While the respondent did not spend much time in the hospital, she was confined to her bed for a considerable period. The testimony shows that the dislocated coccyx projected into the rectum so that its functions became very acute. The coccyx is the center of very sensitive terminal nerves of the spine, and a fracture thereof produces much pain. It also appears that the fractured vertebra resulted in much pain to the respondent; that these pains will continue unless the respondent undergoes a rather serious surgical operation; that it would be necessary to remove the coccyx or the broken portion thereof; that the respondent is compelled to wear a brace, and must continue to wear the same unless she undergoes what one of the doctors called "two surgical operations"; that the respondent, though a married woman, will have to forego motherhood in the future, unless she is willing to suffer abnormal pains. Besides these injuries, the respondent has been rendered nervous, and also is unable to sit in a normal position.

Some of these facts which we have related were disputed by testimony introduced on the part of the appellant, but what we have stated we think the jury was entitled to accept as true, as following from a clear preponderance of the testimony.

[7, 8] In an extended note covering approximately 196 pages appended to the case of Quinn v. Chicago, Mil. & St. Paul Ry. Co., 46 A. L. R. 1298, are collected a large number of cases dealing with verdicts in personal injury cases. A considerable number of these cases involve causes which were tried at a time when the purchasing power of money was much greater than at present, which fact must be taken into consideration when considering an award of damages, as an award of damages in the sum of $7,500 made prior to the World War would, in purchasing power, we think, equal the award in this case. The difference in the purchasing power of money is a common fact of which we think we may properly take notice.

An examination of the cases quoted in the annotation to which we have referred, and which is so extensive that we cannot catalogue any of them, leads to the conclusion that the verdict in this case, based upon the injuries suffered by the plaintiff, is in no wise disproportionate to corresponding cases there quoted.

The recent case of Wulferdinger v. Pickwick Stages System, 293 P. 704, recently decided by this court, is pertinent here. In this case the plaintiff suffered an injury to the coccyx. There was no fracture of any portion of the vertebra. An award of $7,000 was approved. In Putnam v. Pickwick Stages, 98 Cal. App. 268, 276 P. 1055, the plaintiff suffered a shoving forward of the fifth lumbar vertebra, and an award of $7,500 was approved. In Perry v. McLaughlin (Cal. App.) 287 P. 354, an award of $12,500 was approved. The injuries suffered by the plaintiff in that case, as shown by the facts set forth in the record, were not more serious than the injuries suffered by the plaintiff in this action.

[9] A number of other cases have been cited by respondent, but their consideration appears to us unnecessary. We find nothing in the record justifying a conclusion that the verdict is excessive or that the amount thereof has been increased by reason of any improper conduct upon the part of counsel, or error of the court in the admission of testimony.

The judgment is affirmed.

ZUMWALT v. SCHWARZ et al.

Civ. 7242.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.
March 23, 1931.

1. Physicians and surgeons ⚷13.

Physician, calling another physician with patient's approval, held merely patient's agent and not liable for assisting physician's fee.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⚷13.

Person requesting physician's services for another, to whom person making request is not legally obligated to furnish medical aid, does not impliedly promise to pay therefor.

3. Principal and agent ⚷136(2), 190(1).

Agent contracting for disclosed principal is presumed to have intended to bind principal and ordinarily will not be held personally liable, except on clear, explicit evidence of such intent.

4. Physicians and surgeons ⚷24(3).

Evidence held insufficient to charge physician with personal liability for payment of assisting physician's fee.

> There was evidence that physician, calling in other physician to assist in operating on former's patient, said he would see that assisting physician got good fee; that he afterward told assisting physician that he had been asked to get bills from all doctors, but forgot about such physician's bill; and that latter did not keep office records of his services because former said he would take care of fee.

5. Physicians and surgeons ⚷23.

Patient's financial condition may be considered as affecting reasonableness of physician's charges, especially where general custom is to graduate charges accordingly.

6. Customs and usages ⚷10.

General custom or usage must be considered in determining parties' intent, and is, in effect, part of contract, unless latter manifests contrary intent (Civ. Code, § 1655).

7. Physicians and surgeons ⚷24(3).

Testimony that physician's services were worth from $1,500 to $2,500 supported verdict for $1,500, irrespective of patient's financial condition.

8. Trial ⚷251(9).

Refusal of instruction, limiting physician's compensation to items stated in bill of particulars, held not error, where evidence did not extend beyond general scope thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Fred H. Zumwalt against Jacob Schwarz and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed as to defendant Schwarz, and affirmed as to the remaining defendants.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Dunne, Dunne & Cook, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J.

The plaintiff, Fred H. Zumwalt, a physician and surgeon, brought this action against Jacob Schwarz, also a physician and surgeon, and the executors of the last will of Charles W. Haas, deceased, to recover the sum of $1,500 claimed to be due for medical services rendered by plaintiff to the deceased during his lifetime, and upon trial a jury awarded him a verdict against all of the defendants for the full amount claimed. Judgment was entered accordingly, and defendants have joined in taking this appeal therefrom.

[1] Haas had been under the medical care of Schwarz for some time, and when his condition became critical Schwarz, with the approval of his patient, called in Zumwalt to assist him. Thereafter Zumwalt continued to collaborate with Schwarz in the treatment of Haas up to the time of the latter's death, which occurred some four months later. It is contended on behalf of Schwarz as one of the grounds of appeal that in calling in Zumwalt he acted merely as the agent of his patient and consequently is not liable for the payment of any part of Zumwalt's fee. We are of the opinion that this contention must be sustained.

[2, 3] Ordinarily, of course, where a person requests another to perform certain services the law implies a promise on the part of such person to pay the reasonable value of the services performed; but the authorities hold uniformly that such rule has no application to a case where a person requests a physician to perform professional services for another to whom the person making the request is under no legal obligation to furnish medical aid (21 R. C. L. 412; McClenahan v. Keyes, 188 Cal. 574, 206 P. 454); and in the case last cited the Supreme Court of this state has declared that where no such legal obligation exists, one who calls a physician to attend another is not liable for the services performed in the absence of an express agreement to pay therefor. Furthermore, it is a general rule of agency that where an agent contracts on behalf of a disclosed principal the presumption is, in the absence of an agreement otherwise, that it was the agent's intention to bind the principal and not to incur a personal liability; and ordinarily the agent will not be held personally except upon clear and explicit evidence of an intention to substitute or superadd his personal liability for or to that of his principal. Heringer v. Schumacher, 88 Cal. App. 349, 263 P. 550.

[4] Briefly stated, the circumstances under which Zumwalt was employed were as follows: When Haas' condition failed to respond to the treatments Schwarz was administering, he concluded that certain major operations and extreme treatments were essential; and after talking the matter over with the members of Haas' family he consulted with Zumwalt. These consultations extended over a period of some five days, at the end of which time Schwarz phoned Zumwalt that he was very much alarmed about Haas' condition and that he had decided to operate at once; and he asked Zumwalt to be present and assist. Zumwalt informed him that at that particular time he was about to operate on a patient of his own, but Schwarz urged him to defer that operation if possible and to come at once to the hospital, as he was "very anxious" about Haas' case. Haas was a man of much wealth, his estate having been appraised at approximately $1,800,000; and in soliciting Zumwalt's services Schwarz further stated, according to Zumwalt's testimony, "This is not the usual case we have been working together, but I want you to send your bill and I will see you get paid for it, that you get a good fee." Zumwalt insisted on taking care of his own patient first, however, immediately following which he hastened to the hospital to assist Schwarz. Upon his arrival there Schwarz again said to him, so Zumwalt testified: "I am nervous about it (Haas' condition), and I want you, I am particularly glad you got up, that you could come. * * * I will see that you get a good fee for this."

As will be seen, in none of the conversations between the parties did Schwarz promise directly or by intimation that he would become personally responsible for the payment of Zumwalt's services. The strongest interpretation that can be placed upon his language is that he would see that Zumwalt was liberally compensated by Haas. And that such was the understanding of Zumwalt is clearly shown by a conversation he claimed to have had with Schwarz at a hospital about three weeks after Haas' death, the substance of which he related as follows: "I said, 'By the way Jake, what about my bill in the Haas matter, to whom shall I send it and when.' Dr. Schwarz's face colored a little and he said, 'To tell you the truth, I have already been paid in the Haas matter, and I forgot about your bill.' He said, 'The family asked me to get the bills from all the doctors,' and he said, 'I didn't think of yours.' I said, 'That is a very peculiar circumstance, because you are the one who suggested you would take care of my bill in this matter,' and I said, 'If that is the case, the estate has not been closed, and there is no reason why I still am not able to put in a bill against the estate.' He said, 'I would rather you would not do that, it might embarrass me,' and some other words to that effect." Zumwalt nevertheless presented his claim against the Haas estate, averring therein, among other things, that his services had been rendered at the special instance and request of the deceased and Schwarz; but the claim was rejected. And in further confirmation of such understanding Zumwalt testified that the reason he did not keep any office records of his services was that Schwarz said "he would take care of my fee and see that it was taken care of." It is evident, therefore, that construing the foregoing testimony most strongly in favor of plaintiff, it is as a whole legally insufficient, under the authorities above set forth, to charge Schwarz with a personal liability for the payment of said fee.

[5, 6] The further contention is made that the amount of the fee awarded by the jury was excessive, it being argued that the trial court erred in allowing plaintiff to show by the cross-examination of Schwarz that he received a fee of $15,000 for his services, and in refusing to give to the jury two instructions to the effect that in determining the value of Zumwalt's services the jury "was not to consider the financial condition" of Haas, and that it was limited in such determination to certain items of service specified in the instruction and which corresponded with the items set forth in the bill of particulars theretofore delivered by plaintiff to the defendants. We find no merit in any of the foregoing points. The testimony relating to the amount of Schwarz's fee was received without objection on the part of defendants, and the proof showing the value of the Haas estate was admitted under stipulation. It would seem, therefore, that defendants are not in a position to complain of the effect of such evidence. However, aside from the question of the admissibility of such proof, under the weight of authority it is held that the financial condition of a person receiving medical aid may be considered as affecting the reasonableness of the physician's charges; and even in those jurisdictions holding to the negative view it will be found that an exception is made in favor of the consideration of such proof where, as here, there is evidence of a recognized usage, which has grown into a custom, to graduate professional charges with reference to the financial condition of the patient, so that it may be considered that the services were rendered and accepted in contemplation of it. 48 Cor. Jur. 1168. In other words, general custom or usage must be considered in determining the intent of the parties, and is in effect a part of the contract unless the contract manifests a contrary intention. Civ. Code, § 1655. In the present case the several members of the medical profession who testified as to the value of Zumwalt's services, including Schwarz himself, all stated that it was the recognized usage and the established custom of the medical profession in fixing the amount of the medical fees to take into consideration, along with the other elements, the wealth or poverty of the patient. In applying such doctrine the courts of Pennsylvania have said: "This state of affairs the law must recognize, that physicians should not have their services valued, as you would commodities in trade, by a fixed standard; what would be a proper charge for the same service to a man fully able to pay would be excessive to a man of limited means, and what would be willingly done for the indigent, without thought of financial reward, should be compensated for by one who can afford to pay on the scale which doctors of repute measure as the proper one." Pfeiffer v. Dyer, 295 Pa. 306, 145 A. 284, 285. And in quoting approvingly from an earlier case (Succession of Levitan, 143 La. 1025, 79 So. 829, 3 A. L. R. 1646) the court goes on to say that it is "a matter of common information that physicians and surgeons do not regulate their charges by any fixed standard of pecuniary value, but, to a certain extent, base them on the ability of the patient to pay. * * " In the state of New York, where the same rule is followed, the court said: " * * The evidence as to the value of the deceased's estate was properly allowed and properly taken into consideration, and that, together with the experience of the physician as such, and the nature and difficulty or easiness of the case, and what is considered by him and by other physicians an ordinary or reasonable charge for the services, are the proper elements upon which a judge or jury may act in fixing the value of the services." Schoenberg v. Rose (Mun. Ct. N. Y.) 145 N. Y. S. 831, 833.

[7] Irrespective, however, of the question of the materiality of evidence showing the financial condition of the patient, there is ample testimony in the record here to support the full allowance made by the jury for the reason that several witnesses testified that regardless of the financial condition of Haas, Zumwalt's services were reasonably worth from $1,500 to $2,500.

[8] Nor was there any error in the trial court's refusal to give the second instruction proposed by defendants for even assuming, as defendants assert, that plaintiff in claiming compensation was limited to the items of service set forth in his bill of particulars, the evidence introduced by plaintiff in this behalf did not extend beyond the general scope of such items. The matter of consultations with Schwarz, which seems to be the sole ground of defendants' complaint, is adequately included in that part of the bill reading "and in addition thereto approximately six professional visits and consultations." (Italics ours.)

For the reasons above stated, the judgment as to the defendant Schwarz is reversed, and as to the remaining defendants it is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

DEBERRY v. CAVALIER.

Civ. 4316.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 25, 1931.

1. Pleading 🔑229.

Courts in furtherance of justice are liberal in authorizing amendment of pleadings either before or at trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

2. Jury 🔑28(17).

Permission to amend pleading, even though presenting new issue, does not have effect of restoring constitutional right to jury trial previously waived (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

3. Jury 🔑9.

Constitutional right of jury trial should be preserved, but not used as means of delaying or obstructing regular course of litigation.

4. Jury 🔑25(6).

Failure of defendant to demand jury trial within five days after receiving notice that cause had been set for trial was waiver of right (Code Civ. Proc. § 631, subd. 4).

5. Jury 🔑26.

Right of trial by jury was waived by failure to deposit with clerk of court sum of money equal to one day's jury fees (Code Civ. Proc. § 631, subd. 5).

6. Jury 🔑25(6).

Jury trial was properly denied for failure to demand jury within five days after receiving notice cause had been set for trial, regardless of subsequent amendment and cross-complaint presenting new issue (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 437, 439, 473, and § 631, subds. 4, 5).

7. Jury 🔑26.

Deposit of personal bank check for one day's jury fees was not deposit of "money," as required by statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 631, subd. 5).

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment in a suit upon a conditional contract for sale of an electric refrigerator. It is contended that the defendant was denied his constitutional right to a trial by jury, and that the amount of attorney's fees which was allowed is excessive.

The complaint was filed February 8, 1930. An answer denying the material allegations of the complaint was filed March 25, 1930. May 6th of the same year the case was regularly set for trial for June 5th. The day following the setting of the case for trial the defendant was duly notified of the date of trial. No demand for a trial by jury was made, except as hereinafter stated. May 26, 1930, the defendant served and filed his notice of intention to move the court for permission to amend his answer and file a cross-complaint. This motion was duly made on the 31st day of May. June 2d the court made an order granting the motion to amend the answer and permitting the filing of a cross-complaint. The amended answer and the pleading which is termed a cross-complaint were filed June 5th, at the time the case came on for trial. The answer to the cross-complaint was filed the same day. At the request of the defendant, the cause was continued to June 7th to be reset for trial. For the first time, on June 7th, the defendant filed a demand for a jury. The payment of no jury fees accompanied this demand. This demand resulted in a continuance of the time of trial to June 26th. The demand for a trial by jury was denied on the ground that this privilege had been waived by the defendant by his failure to request a jury within the time and in the manner provided by section 631 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the day of the trial, the defendant appeared by counsel, and again renewed his motion for a trial by jury, leaving with the clerk of court the personal bank check of J. Oscar Goldstein, one of the attorneys for the defendant, for the sum of $36 for the jury fees for the first day of trial pursuant to section 631, supra. This check was not accepted by the clerk as payment. It was objected to by the respondent on the ground that it was not legal tender for the payment of the fees. Thereupon the defendant's demand for a jury trial was again denied. The defendant then moved for a continuance, which was also denied. The foregoing facts are undisputed.

The plaintiff adduced its evidence before the court sitting without a jury. At the close of the plaintiff's case, the defendant announced that he would introduce no evidence in support of his cross-complaint or otherwise, but would rely upon the validity of his demand for a trial by jury. The court thereupon adopted findings favorable to the plaintiff and against the defendant upon all the material issues. A judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $543.40, together with 12 per cent. interest per annum thereon from February 8, 1930, at which time said sum became due, and the further sum of $250 as attorney's fees. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

The defendant contends that the filing of his cross-complaint which raises a new issue automatically vacated the former order setting the case for trial, and that the case was then placed on the calendar for the first time on June 7th to be set for trial, upon the issues finally adopted, at which time he demanded a trial by jury; that a jury trial was therefore not waived by him.

[1-3] It is true that the cross-complaint presents a new issue. It alleges the defendant's place of business was destroyed by fire which resulted from defective wiring used by the plaintiff in installing the electric refrigerator, and that the defendant was damaged thereby in the sum of $4,500. If this claim lies against the plaintiff for damages resulting from defective wiring, it is because the contract for the purchase of the electric refrigerator imposes upon the plaintiff the responsibility of safely and efficiently installing the plant. The liability is then imposed as an incident to the same transaction. The liability is in the nature of a counterclaim rather than a cross-complaint. 21 Cal. Jur. 73, § 45. If it constitutes a counterclaim, the allegations of new matter properly become a part of the answer. Section 437, Code Civ. Proc. If the new matter is properly presented as a counterclaim, its omission from the answer would create a waiver of the claim. Section 439, Code Civ. Proc. This new matter, therefore, constitutes a mere amendment of the answer which was permitted by the court "in furtherance of justice" pursuant to the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In furtherance of justice, courts are very properly liberal in authorizing the amendment of pleadings either before or at the trial. The permission to amend a pleading, however, even though it may present a new issue, does not have the effect of restoring one's constitutional right to a trial by jury which has been previously waived. The constitutional right of a trial by jury is a valuable privilege derived from the wholesome influence of Magna Carta, and should be preserved and enforced in all its efficacy. This right, however, should not be used as a means of delaying or obstructing the regular course of litigation. This privilege should be exercised with due diligence. The Legislature has therefore wisely provided that:

> "Trial by jury may be waived, * * *
> "4. By failing to announce that a jury is required, at the time the cause is first set upon the trial calendar if it be set upon notice or stipulation, or within five days after notice of setting if it be set without notice or stipulation.
> "5. By failing to deposit with the clerk, within ten days prior to the date set for trial, a sum equal to the amount of one (1) day's jury fees payable under the law."

[4, 5] In the present case the right of trial by jury was waived by failure on the part of the defendant to demand a jury trial within five days from the receiving of notice that the cause had been duly set for trial. The right of trial by jury was also waived by failure to deposit with the clerk of court a sum of money equal to one day's jury fees.

[6] Under the circumstances of this case, it may not reasonably be said the cause was first placed on the court calendar June 7th to be set for trial. If the mere amending of a pleading were to have the effect of restoring the right to a trial by jury which had been previously waived, the privilege of amending pleadings might be resorted to as a means of delaying and obstructing the orderly course of procedure. At the trial of this case, no evidence was offered by the defendant in support of his counterclaim. Evidently he had little faith in the justice of this claim. Certainly an issue which is abandoned at the trial of a cause may not become the means of restoring the right of trial by jury which is otherwise waived. There was no error in denying the defendant's application for a trial by jury under the circumstances of this case.

There is nothing in the cases of Ferrea v. Chabot, 121 Cal. 233, 53 P. 689, 1092; Wendling Lumber Co. v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 19 Cal. App. 1, 124 P. 734, or Reese v. Baum, 83 App. Div. 550, 82 N. Y. S. 157, 158, relied upon by the appellant, which is in conflict with the foregoing conclusion. In the Ferrea Case the propriety of relieving a litigant from a previous stipulation waiving the right of trial by jury is approved, when it appears that the stipulation was made through mistake, or procured by fraud. The court, however, affirmed the order of the trial court denying the application for a trial by jury, saying that the order would not be disturbed on appeal except for an abuse of discretion. In the Wendling Lumber Company Case, where a demand for trial by jury was originally made pursuant to statute, and a mistrial of the cause occurred, it was held a subsequent demand for a jury was unnecessary, for the reason that the original demand was presumed to be continuing, and therefore adequate. The decision in the New York case of Reese v. Baum is based upon a statute which is radically different from the California Code. The New York statute provides that: "At the time when an issue of fact is joined, either party may demand a trial by jury, and unless so demanded at the joining of issue, a jury trial is waived." Pursuant to this statute, it was there properly held that an amendment which authorized the plaintiff to change his cause of action from one of liability on a contract to that of a tort should not be allowed without granting the defendant the right of trial by jury. The statutory waiver of the right of trial by jury in New York state depends upon the making of a demand therefor "at the [time of] joining of issue." In that case the issues were not joined by the filing of a complaint which was based upon a false statement of the facts. The real issue in that case was one of tort, not liability on a contract. On the contrary, the statute of California bases the waiver of the right to trial by jury upon a failure to demand that privilege when the case is first placed upon the trial calendar to be set, or within five days after notice thereof, regardless of subsequent amendments which may be made to the pleadings.

[7] Moreover, the defendant failed to comply with the statute by depositing with the clerk of court, ten days before the date set for trial, a sum of money equal to one day's jury fees. All that he ever deposited was a personal bank check for $36. This check was not accepted by the clerk as payment. It was objected to on the ground that the check was not legal tender for the payment. In 21 Ruling Case Law, 37, § 34, it is said: "In the absence of any agreement to the contrary money is the sole medium of payment." At page 60, § 59, of the last-cited authority, it is further said: "With the exception of a few jurisdictions the authorities are unanimous in supporting the rule that the giving of a bank check by a debtor for the amount of his indebtedness to the payee is not, in the absence of an express or implied agreement to that effect, a payment or discharge of the debt."

[8-11] The allowance of an attorney's fee of $250 in this case does not appear to be excessive. The contract provides for an allowance of a reasonable sum for this purpose. The complaint first asked for $200. When the counterclaim was filed demanding $4,500 damages for loss by fire resulting from defective wiring in installing the refrigerator, the plaintiff was allowed to amend the prayer of his complaint so as to increase his demand for counsel fees to the sum of $500. Permission to amend the prayer of the complaint in this regard, under the circumstances, does not seem unreasonable. Preparation for a defense to the charge contained in the counterclaim would greatly increase the labor of plaintiff's attorney. The abandonment of this issue at the trial could not have been anticipated. The reasonableness of the amount of the fee which was allowed depends upon the record of the proceedings and the circumstances of the case. In determining what sum will adequately compensate an attorney for his services, the court may properly consider the amount which is involved in the litigation, the intricacies of the facts and the law of the case, the standing and skill of the attorney, and every other fact or circumstance which will enable the court to fix a sum which will fairly compensate the attorney for his services. 3 Cal. Jur. 698, § 96; 2 R. C. L. 1059, § 145. We are unable to say that the amount of $250 which was fixed by the court as an attorney fee in this case is not adequately supported by the record. The value of an attorney's fee is frequently difficult to estimate accurately. The judgment of a trial court in that regard will not be disturbed, unless it is clearly erroneous.

The judgment is affirmed.

March 17, 1931.

Automobiles ⚷244(36).

Evidence respecting cause of death of pedestrian struck by truck held insufficient to warrant recovery against owner of truck.

> Testimony was to effect that driver of truck and passenger immediately after striking woman ran to place where she lay on pavement, and that before they could pick her up an approaching automobile disregarding their signal passed directly over woman and did not stop. There was no proof as to nature or extent of injuries or whether death was caused by collision of truck with her person or by wheels of automobile as they passed over her.

WORKS, P. J.

This is an action to recover damages for the death of the mother of the plaintiff minor. The events because of which Mrs. La Paughl lost her life occurred upon a dark and very rainy night, on Twenty-Third street, near its intersection with Oak street, in Los Angeles. A truck driven by defendant Watkins was proceeding westward on the numbered street, the driver having with him as a passenger one Howeth. When the vehicle had gotten about fifteen feet west of the intersection its right front fender struck Mrs. La Paughl, who was seen by neither Watkins nor Howeth until the moment of the impact, and knocked her to the pavement.

The plaintiffs had judgment, and the corporation defendant, the employer of Watkins, appeals.

The following statement of a part of the testimony of Watkins appears in the brief of respondents, the italics being those of the brief: "I only saw the woman at the very instant of the impact between her and the right front fender of the truck. I do not know whether or not she had been walking on West 23rd street toward the truck, away from the truck, or had approached from the side. The truck traveled about twenty feet from the place of the accident to the place where I stopped it alongside of and parallel with the northerly curb of West 23rd street. Mr. Howeth left the truck first. He ran immediately to the woman. I immediately followed him. She lay on the pavement between the northerly rail of the westbound car track and the northerly curb of West 23rd street. Her head was toward the curb. She was dressed in dark clothing. She had a long coat on made of a dark material. The coat had a large collar. She had been carrying an umbrella. It was made of dark purple material it was wet. The umbrella was broken when we found it but it had the appearance of having been open at the time of the accident. After we arrived at the place where the woman was lying and as we stooped down to pick her up, a Ford automobile approached along West 23rd street from the east. It was about twenty feet away when I first saw it. It was going west on 23rd street between the northerly rail of the west-bound car track and the northerly curb of that street. The woman was lying on the pavement directly in the path of that automobile. The ford automobile was approaching at a speed of about twenty-five miles per hour. Mr. Howeth made an effort to signal that automobile. He had a flashlight and was flashing it toward the Ford automobile as it approached. It did not seem to me that the speed of the Ford automobile was slackened as it approached the place where the woman was lying. If it did slacken at all it was not to any appreciable extent. The lights on the Ford automobile were burning. Mr. Howeth had to jump back to avoid being struck. I also jumped back. The Ford automobile passed directly over the woman. It did not stop."

Immediately after Mrs. La Paughl was run over by the Ford car she was taken to a residence near at hand. She never recovered consciousness and died that same night. She was seen by several persons after the accidents and during her unconsciousness, and her body, of course, was seen by some persons after her death. A number of these various persons were called as witnesses by the plaintiffs, but none of them was asked a single question to bring forth proof as to the nature or extent of her injuries, or whether her death was caused by the collision of the truck with her person or by the wheels of the Ford as they passed over her. It was not shown that she bled. It was not shown that there were bruises, cuts, or lacerations on any part of her person, whether caused by a blow or by moving wheels. It was not shown whether bones were broken, either by a blow or by the rolling of wheels across her person. Indeed, respondents do not contend that it can be determined from the record whether the death of the unfortunate woman was caused by the one vehicle or by the other. And they say in their brief that "it is immaterial whether it was the truck or the Ford that caused Ellen La Paughl's death, and further that it does not lie in appellant's mouth to complain that the driver of the Ford may have been negligent, or may have actually killed Mrs. La Paughl, since the evidence amply supports the jury's implied finding that Watkins' negligence was the proximate cause of Mrs. La Paughl's death."

Respondents then quote from section 10 of Beach on Contributory Negligence, thus: "An act is the proximate cause of an event when, in the natural order of things and under the circumstances, it would necessarily produce that event, when it is the first and direct power producing the result, the causa causans of the schoolmen." Following this quotation respondents cite in support of their contention Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 74 Cal. App. 303, 240 P. 53, 55; Oakland Bank v. Murfey, 68 Cal. 455, 9 P. 843; and Merrill v. L. A. Gas & Elec. Corp., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134.

There is no room for the application of these cases in aid of respondents. Indeed, the statement of the rule in the Merrill Case shows that it cannot help them. There was no connection between the alleged negligence of Watkins and the act of the driver of the Ford in running his car over Mrs. La Paughl. That act did not "follow from the original wrong in unbroken sequence." It did not follow from, that is, it was not caused by, "the original wrong" at all. Mrs. La Paughl was struck down by the truck. Watkins drove to the curb and stopped his vehicle twenty feet beyond the place where she lay. He and his passenger leaped from their seat, ran back to the recumbent form, and bent over it long enough to determine that the stricken woman was unconscious. The Ford car was seen approaching. Howeth endeavored to stop its onrush by flashing his electric torch, but in vain, and the Ford passed over the body of the unfortunate woman. We cannot but conclude that she was the unhappy victim of two independent and, in a legal sense, totally distinct casualties. Surely, the first cause did not set any other cause in motion or into activity. It is equally true that the second act was "disconnected in time and nature" (Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., supra) from the first. Suppose Watkins and Howeth had not discovered what object was struck by the fender of the truck and had driven on. Suppose the Ford came along an hour later and ran over the prostrate woman. Suppose some one appeared on the scene soon after and discovered that she was still unconscious, but that she died later. Suppose the nature of both catastrophies was afterward discovered, and that respondents then brought suit for damages against Watkins and his employer. It is certain that respondents must then have shown whether the victim's death was caused by the truck or by the Ford. There is no difference between such a situation and the one here actually presented.

Other points are made by appellant, but we find it unnecessary to decide them.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries to the plaintiff, resulting in a verdict in the sum of $5,600. The defendants prosecute this appeal from the judgment.

The injuries resulted from a collision of two automobiles on the Roosevelt highway in Los Angeles county, in one of which, a Cadillac, the plaintiff was riding as a guest. The Cadillac was owned by a man named Phillips, who was on the right-hand side of the front seat at the time of the accident, and was being driven by a person called Jenkins, and Mrs. Bowker was seated between them. The defendant Thornburgh was driving a Dodge car, and he was the agent and servant of the corporate defendant Illinois Electric Company. It was claimed by respondent that Thornburgh was driving on the left or wrong side of the road; that he crowded the Cadillac completely off the highway, where it was struck, overturned, and wrecked. It is conceded by appellants that upon the issue of negligence the evidence was conflicting, and that, when tested by the rules governing the determination of appeals, sustains the verdict.

[1-3] It is urged, however, that the court fell into error when the judge instructed the jury as follows: "Any negligence of which Jenkins may have been guilty in the operation of his car cannot be imputed to or charged against the plaintiff unless he was her agent, and he was not her agent unless she had full authority to direct, control and command him in the driving of said car, or unless you find they were engaged in a joint enterprise. It is not sufficient to make an enterprise joint that the persons were coming from or bound on a common mission, but it is necessary for each to have authority in the control, management and driving of said car." It is not disputed that the instruction substantially states the law of imputed negligence in the case of a passenger or guest in an automobile, but it is said that the respondent was not the guest of the driver of the automobile, but of the owner Phillips; hence the instruction was not applicable. It is also argued that the court inadvertently and erroneously used the expression "his car" as indicating that Jenkins was the owner of the automobile instead of Phillips. Assuming, for the moment that there was negligence on the part of the driver of the car and also negligence on the part of the owner thereof in not requiring the former to drive differently, it would still remain the immediate negligence of Jenkins which contributed to the injuries, and that negligence could not under the law be imputed to the respondent except under the conditions defined in the instruction. Whether the respondent was guilty of negligence herself was left to the jury by other instructions. The appellants cannot complain that these other instructions are not more definite upon the question. Evidently they were satisfied at the time of trial, because they asked for none in addition. So far as the expression "his car" is concerned, the testimony establishes without contradiction that the automobile belonged to Phillips. This fact was not in dispute. The words were then evidently and patently used to designate the car under his immediate control, the car which he was driving. Under the circumstances of the case, it is impossible for us to believe the jury understood them in any different light.

[4] The other question which requires discussion relates to the admission in evidence of testimony given by the husband of the respondent who visited the scene of the accident during the early morning following its occurrence. He was permitted over the objection of the defendants to testify to certain marks apparently made by automobile tires when the brakes were applied to the wheels. He testified that he was familiar with the Cadillac automobile which was wrecked; that it had been equipped with a California top; that he found the "wreckage of the cars, parts of the cars, mostly of the Cadillac top and pieces of upholstering and tin and such like, and also blood stains on the cement"; that two burned rubber marks started about 25 or 30 feet from where the wreckage was and about the width of a machine in from the outside of the pavement, and that "they varied from about four feet or the width of the car to begin with out to within, I should judge a foot of the outside of the paving"; that at that point they were "just as if the machine went just sidewise, just sweeped sidewise." In another answer the witness explained that the outside wheel went off in the sand and that the inside wheel tapered in until it came within about a foot of the edge. Evidence was introduced by the defendants to show that an officer who came to the scene of the accident skidded his wheels when stopping and that a number of cars were compelled to stop, as the witness put it, "awful quick to keep from hitting someone else." But we think the proximity of the marks leading as they did directly to the wreckage and apparently corroborating the testimony of some of the eyewitnesses, rendered the testimony sufficiently relevant to go to the jury. In Meier v. Wagner, 27 Cal. App. 579, 150 P. 797, 798, it is said: "The testimony of witness Sontag, to the effect that on the next morning following the injury to plaintiff he visited the place where the collision occurred and found, alongside a trail of blood, the track or imprint of a wheel made under restraint of brakes applied thereto, was properly admitted as a circumstance corroborating the testimony of other witnesses that plaintiff, when struck by the fender of defendant's car, was dragged along the street for some distance, until defendant stopped his car." To same effect see Fong Lin v. Probert, 50 Cal. App. 340, 195 P. 437. Counsel's objection to this testimony is directed rather to its weight than its relevancy.

[5] It is true that in one of the witness' answers he said these marks were those of the Cadillac, but no motion was made to strike this particular part of the answer; the motion being based upon the same ground as the objection and running to the entire answer. The error, if any there was in this casual reference, was trivial and not prejudicial, and probably that is the reason for the lack of the particularized motion.

Judgment affirmed.

NOURSE, P. J.

Defendants had a verdict in an action for damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the verdict upon typewritten transcripts.

The action grew out of an accident wherein the plaintiff, a child of 7 years, was struck by a truck driven by defendant Loney Rogers while in the employ of his codefendant. The plaintiff, accompanied by her brother of about 10 years of age and another girl of about 7, attempted to cross to the south side of Harmon street in the city of Berkeley at a point about midway between the street intersections. The little girl ran out from behind an automobile parked along the north curb, and, when she had reached a point beyond the center line of Harmon street, her brother called to her to warn her of the approaching truck. She then apparently became confused and turned to retrace her steps. When the driver of the truck saw her crossing, he swerved the truck from the right-hand side of the road and brought the truck to a stop at a point to the left of the center line of the street. The right front wheel of the truck struck the plaintiff on the heel and threw her to the ground, causing the injuries complained of. The defendants, in addition to their denials of negligence on their part, pleaded unavoidable accident and contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff.

[1] On this appeal the appellant assigns as error the action of the trial court in denying her the privilege of calling the defendant Rogers as a witness under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, until she had exhausted her own witnesses; but, as she assented to the procedure, there is nothing involved but the well-settled rule that the order of proof is to be regulated in the sound discretion of the court. Code Civ. Proc. § 2042.

[2] Error is predicated on the ruling permitting the defendant Rogers to state that the father of plaintiff had told him that he did not blame him (Rogers) for the injuries to the plaintiff. The answer was given on a redirect examination upon the theory that it was part of a conversation brought out on cross-examination. The ruling was error, and the answer was mere hearsay, elicited by an improperly suggestive and leading question. But the plaintiff, upon examination of her own witness, brought out the same matter; hence the ruling was not prejudicial.

[3] The appellant devotes considerable space in her brief to the argument that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. It would serve no purpose to recite the testimony of the various witnesses; it is sufficient to say that there is some conflict, and that, to our minds, the great preponderance of the evidence is with the respondents. Under such circumstances it is not the province of the appellate court to interfere with the finding of the jury. Bennett v. Chanslor & Lyon Co., 204 Cal. 101, 105, 266 P. 803.

[4, 5] The appellant assigns error in the instruction given on the element of unavoidable or inevitable accident. That was one of the theories upon which respondents defended the action, and they were entitled to have an instruction covering it (Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry, 117 Cal. 257, 261, 49 P. 185), as it is the duty of the trial judge to instruct the jury upon every reasonable theory of either party finding support in the evidence (Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 479, 143 P. 743; Murero v. Reinhart Lumber Co., 85 Cal. App. 385, 387, 259 P. 494).

[6, 7] Appellant's criticism of the instructions relating to the plea of contributory negligence is difficult to understand. Her position seems to be that there is a presumption somewhere that a child of tender years lacks capacity to commit an act of negligence; hence the plea of contributory negligence is not available when a child of tender years is suing as plaintiff. We understand the rule to be that negligence will not be imputed to a child of tender years (Gonzales v. Davis, 197 Cal. 256, 260, 240 P. 16; Seperman v. Lyon Fire Proof Storage Co., 97 Cal. App. 654, 658, 275 P. 980), but that the question of the capacity of the particular child to exercise care in avoiding a particular danger is one of fact to be left to the jury (Cahill v. Stone & Co., 153 Cal. 571, 577, 96 P. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094; Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 167 Cal. 126, 139, 138 P. 712). The instruction complained of advised the jury that "a child is required to exercise only that measure of care which children of the same age and under similar circumstances ordinarily exercise," and it was left to the jury to determine the measure of care required of appellant under the circumstances of this case. The instruction as a whole was fair to appellant, and was well within the rule of the decisions. See Todd v. Orcutt, 42 Cal. App. 687, 690, 183 P. 963; Richmond v. Moore, 103 Cal. App. 173, 284 P. 681.

[8, 9] Finally error is assigned in giving the instruction reading: "If you find that the driver of the defendant's truck, after discovering the perilous position of Marjorie Wanda Graham, exercised ordinary care to avoid injuring Marjorie Wanda Graham, then your verdict must be for the defendants." Standing alone, the portion of the charge quoted is open to some of the criticisms made by the appellant, but this paragraph must be read with the entire charge, and, when so read, it is unobjectionable. The paragraph immediately follows the language of the charge which advised the jury that, when either party "without negligence upon his or her part" is suddenly confronted with imminent danger, he is not required to exercise that degree of care or skill which is required in the commission of an act after careful deliberation. The evidence showed that both parties were suddenly confronted with imminent danger, and it showed as well that the driver of the truck was in that position without negligence on his part. Herein lies the difference between this case and Vedder v. Bireley, 92 Cal. App. 52, 267 P. 724, cited by appellant, where the position of imminent danger was the direct result of the defendant's negligence. Taking the instructions as a whole, the law applicable to the issues involved was fully and fairly presented to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

Clark & Heafey, of Oakland, for appellant.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued on an open book account and recovered judgment for $3.000. The defendant appeals on a bill of exceptions.

For many years prior to January 9, 1926, the plaintiff had been in the business of selling brick to the defendant under an agreement whereby the defendant from time to time made cash advances on request of the plaintiff and the latter billed the brick to defendant at $1 less than market price. The accounts of the parties were evidenced by vouchers forwarded by the defendant with each check showing the advances made and the credits of such advances on purchases from plaintiff. This practice continued from November, 1923, to July, 1926. On January 9, 1926, defendant sent plaintiff a check for $1,500 attached to a voucher designating it as "cash advanced on account." On January 14, 1926, a similar check for $1,500 was sent attached to a voucher reading "cash advanced." Both checks were received by plaintiff and cashed by indorsement of the president and manager of plaintiff. The proceeds of the first check were used by the plaintiff corporation to cover its pay roll in the operation of its business. The proceeds of the second check were taken from the corporation by its president and manager and were used by him in the purchase of additional stock of the plaintiff corporation for his own account.

On February 17, 1926, the defendant forwarded to the plaintiff corporation four vouchers showing an itemized account of the purchases of brick from plaintiff down to February 13, 1926, crediting defendant with the $3,000 advanced, and showing a balance of $734.32. Attached to these vouchers and inclosed in the same envelope were the defendant's check covering the balance, and a letter of inclosure asking plaintiff to notify the defendant if any further amounts were due. The vouchers and the check were received by plaintiff, and the check was cashed in due course; but the plaintiff's president testified he had not seen the letter. No complaint was made by plaintiff, but the parties continued to do business as formerly, and the plaintiff billed the defendant upon the goods sold after February 13 only. Approximately two years after the statement of this account in February, 1926, plaintiff made demand on defendant for the payment of $3,000 for brick sold and delivered prior thereto and commenced this proceeding.

[1-3] On this appeal the defendant relies upon the well-settled rule that, when a party neglects to object to an account within a reasonable time it becomes an account stated between the parties. Adopting this rule to its plea of payment the appellant contends that the statement of the account in February, 1926, which shows a credit of the $3,000 advanced to the bill of goods sold and the payment of the balance then stated to be due, is an acknowledgment of payment in full for all the items contained in respondent's bill of particulars. Respondent's reply to this is twofold: That there is a conflict of evidence, and hence it must be inferred that the trial court found that no account was stated; and, second, that the answer did not specially plead the statement of the account.

The only conflict in the evidence is the wholly immaterial evidence that the president of the respondent corporation unlawfully took the proceeds of the second check for his own purposes and that the president of the appellant either urged or suggested that he should do so. There is no evidence that the statement of account and the letter of inclosure were not received by the respondent corporation and there is no conflict in the evidence that it was treated by both corporations as a correct statement of account between the parties for a period of approximately two years. As to the first check for $1,500, it is conceded that this amount was used by respondent to cover its "pay roll," and from this it is argued that it was not an advanced payment in the ordinary course of business. We cannot follow respondent. It does not appear that in any of the advances made over this three-year period the appellant specified the purpose for which respondent was to use the money. The payment of its pay roll is, of course, a corporate purpose, and the corporation having taken the money from appellant for that purpose the appellant is entitled to credit on the goods billed to it. This no doubt was the view which the corporation took when it failed for approximately two years to assert any claim to the contrary. The conceded and undisputed facts bring the case squarely within the rule that the account submitted February, 1926, is deemed accepted and constituted an account stated. Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, 67, 15 P. 371; 1 R. C. L. 213; 1 Cal. Jur. 196, and cases cited.

[4-6] The question remains whether under the pleadings the appellant was entitled to rely on this defense. The plaintiff sued on an open book account. The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint and pleaded full payment of the amount claimed due. The defense of a stated account is not a special defense which must be pleaded in those terms. The statement of account upon which the defendant relied was evidence of payment of the account in full. Hence, under the special plea of "payment," the defendant might offer proof of the statement of the account, just as he might offer proof of an accord and satisfaction or of a receipt of payment. Respondent relies on Vaughan v. County of Tulare, 56 Cal. App. 261, 268, 205 P. 21, where the court held that, when the action was brought and defended on the original contract, the defendant could not raise the plea of account stated on appeal. The case is not in point. This cause was defended, and defended most vigorously, on the ground that the account was stated, and the respondent was not prejudiced by the failure to plead that defense specifically in the answer.

The judgment is reversed.

SPENCE, J.

This is an appeal from an order granting the petition of respondent Iris Macpherson for partial distribution.

The property involved is a diamond ring. The argument for reversal of the order is based entirely upon appellants' construction of the terms of the will. The testator left an olographic will providing that his money was to be "divided between" his brothers and sisters; that his bonds were to be "divided between" his nieces, Hazel Stirling and Iris Macpherson, and then follows the provision in question, "Let Iris and Hazel shake dice for the diamond ring." Following the testator's death and before the dice had been shaken, Hazel died leaving an olographic will providing, "I want my half of the diamond ring * * * to go to my mother, Elizabeth A. Stirling" (one of the appellants herein). The court ordered the ring distributed to respondent Iris Macpherson upon her petition for partial distribution stating as follows: "The intention of the testator was that Iris or Hazel should have the ring. He had no intention to give each of the girls a share in the ring. The estate in the ring never passed to the two girls. Hazel died before the ring was disposed of and the only person to take the ring is Iris."

Appellants contend that upon the death of the testator the title to the ring became vested in Iris and Hazel as tenants in common and that the court erred in granting partial distribution of the ring to Iris as the interest of Hazel had not been divested. In support of their position appellants cite Estate of Hittell, 141 Cal. 432, 75 P. 53, and Estate of Murphy, 157 Cal. 63, 106 P. 230, 137 Am. St. Rep. 110, and argue that no right of survivorship existed as a tenancy in common and not a joint tenancy was created. Under the terms of the will in the present case we are of the opinion that the authorities cited are inapplicable and that there is no merit in appellants' contentions.

[1, 2] The provision of the will in question was rather novel. We have found no authorities directly in point and must rely upon general principles in determining its proper construction. It is a cardinal rule in the interpretation of a will that it is to be construed according to the intention of the testator (Civ. Code, § 1317), and to this rule, all auxiliary rules of construction and presumptions should be subordinated. Estate of Blake, 157 Cal. 448, 458, 108 P. 287. Section 1317 of the Civil Code provides: "A will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator. Where his intention cannot have effect to its full extent, it must have effect as far as possible." What was the intention of the testator here? He obviously intended to make a bequest of the ring to one person only, namely either Iris or Hazel, but not to both. It was his further intention that chance should determine which one of the two nieces should receive the ring. In our opinion the testator had no intention that Iris and Hazel should become vested at any time with undivided interests in the ring either as joint tenants or as tenants in common. His intention could not have effect to its fullest extent as the determination by chance had not been made prior to Hazel's death, but his primary intention that either one or the other of the two nieces should have the ring could still be given effect by distributing the ring to the survivor. By its order granting partial distribution to respondent, the trial court correctly construed the will so that the intention of the testator would "have effect as far as possible." Civ. Code, § 1317.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The public administrator of San Francisco filed a petition asking that a purported will be admitted to probate and that he be appointed administrator with the will annexed. After due notice certain heirs appeared and filed a written opposition. To that pleading the administrator filed an answer and on the issues so made a trial was had before the trial court. It made findings of fact in favor of the public administrator, and in its conclusion of law it found that the purported will was the last will and testament of the deceased and that the public administrator was entitled to letters of administration with the will annexed. From a judgment entered thereon two of the heirs have appealed and have brought up a bill of exceptions. The bill of exceptions shows that the only evidence introduced in the trial court consisted of a showing as to the will being in the handwriting of the deceased and evidence as to the kith and kin of the deceased and evidence identifying the beneficiaries named in the will.

On this appeal there is but one point made. The contestants claim that the trial court erred in applying the law to the purported will and ordering it admitted to probate. The public administrator claims that the trial court made no error. A photographic copy of the purported will is contained in the transcript. It is as follows:

"Sept 12—1929

"This is my will—Elizabeth Ryan Brooks

"To my sister—Mrs. W L Perkins—857—Lincoln Ave. St. Paul Minesoto—I give five Shares of A. T. T. Stock—

"To Miss Alice Newman 641 O'Farrall St. S. F I give five Shares of A. T. T Stock—

"To Miss Elizabeth Susan O Brien 857—Lincoln Ave St-Paul Minn—five Shares of Great Western Power Stock—

"To Mrs Joseph Ryan, 2426 Howard N. Seattle Wash. Twenty Shares of Calif Edison Stock—

"To Mrs Mary Springer Allen 2100 Bay St —S. F four Shares of Paraffin Stock

"To my Sister Mary Elen Ryan Chicago I give $1.00

"To my brother T. A Ryan $1.00"

[1, 2] It will be noted that the writer did not end the instrument with a period. However, it will also be noted that with few exceptions numerous periods and punctuation marks are omitted. The will does not contain a residuary clause nor does it show that the decedent possessed any other properties than those mentioned in the will. On the face of the document between the expression giving a legacy to Mrs. Mary Springer Allen and the expression giving a legacy to Mary Ellen Ryan the writer left two blank lines. The ending is abrupt and without a period. The first line, "This is my will—Elizabeth Ryan Brooks," is quite out of the ordinary. If it had been the last expression instead of the first there would be no question remaining in the case to be determined. The respective counsel cite and rely on the decisions in recent cases. As to some points both counsel cite the same case. It is now well settled that in determining whether a certain writing is an holographic will the fact "must be established upon the face of the offered instrument that it is a complete and executed document; that notwithstanding that the usual place of signing and so of evidencing this execution and completeness is at the end of the instrument, the signature of the testator found elsewhere than at the end may be, if circumstances warrant it, a signature of execution, but that the only evidence which will warrant this conclusion must be found in and on the instrument itself. * * *" Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 424, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778. In applying the rule in some cases the court found that the instrument before the court contained words showing that the writer had done everything that he intended to do. Estate of McMahon, supra; Estate of Morgan, 200 Cal. 400, 253 P. 702; Estate of England, 85 Cal. App. 486, 259 P. 956; Estate of Sullivan, 94 Cal. App. 674, 677, 271 P. 753. At least one of the cases turned on the fact that the signature was at the top and not at the end of the purported will, but there was no room on the paper for the writer to sign at the end. Estate of Streeton, 183 Cal. 284, 288, 191 P. 16. Some other cases turned on the fact that there was on the face of the instrument something showing affirmatively that the writer had not finished doing the things he intended to do. Estate of Manchester, 174 Cal. 417, 418, 163 P. 358, L. R. A. 1917D, 629, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 227; Estate of Devlin, 198 Cal. 721, 726, 247 P. 577. Again some cases turned on the fact that on the face of the instrument there was nothing showing affirmatively that the writing of his name by the writer in the exordium was by him intended as a signature. Estate of Bernard, 197 Cal. 36, 40, 239 P. 404; Estate of Hurley, 178 Cal. 713, 714, 174 P. 669.

[3-5] We think the instrument before us falls partly under each of the classes just enumerated. The first sentence, "This is my will—Elizabeth Ryan Brooks," has probative force to uphold the inference that the name of the decedent was written with the intention of evidencing the fact that the document was her fully executed completed will. The gap or unwritten space mentioned above, the absence of a period at the end, the omission of a residuary legacy clause, and the failure to name an executor are facts on which an inference may be founded that the document was not intended as a will. Now it will be conceded, as contended by the respondent, that "it is the peculiar and exclusive province of the trial court or trial jury in the first instance to make such finding of fact, and it is especially the right of every litigant to have all facts so determined by court or jury, this court sitting only to review the findings and being empowered to set them aside as matter of law only when not sustained by adequate evidence. Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 799, 158 P. 753. Estate of Streeton, 183 Cal. 284, 289, 191 P. 16, applies that rule to such cases as the one before us. Then in Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 426, 213 P. 42, 44, 26 A. L. R. 123, the court said: "In so far as the evidence is subject to opposing inferences, it must upon a review thereof be regarded in the light most favorable to the support of the judgment." Under the circumstances mentioned we are unable, as a matter of law, to say the trial court erred by drawing the wrong inference.

The order is affirmed.

Mr. Justice pro tem. TUTTLE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action brought to recover damages for injuries received in an automobile collision. The jury brought in a general verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $30,000, and also a verdict in favor of the husband of plaintiff in the sum of $4,829.11. Of the latter sum, $2,000 was for loss of his wife's services.

Two questions are presented upon this appeal. The first is that of excessive damages, and the second is the correctness of one instruction.

The record shows, almost without dispute, that the driver of defendant's automobile was guilty of negligence. When asked by counsel for defendants as to how the accident occurred, he replied: "Well, I simply fell asleep." While in that condition he drove over to the left side of the highway and collided with plaintiffs' car.

A number of injuries were received by the wife, who was 59 years of age at the time of the accident, and in good health prior thereto. After the accident she was taken to the hospital at Redding and confined there six weeks. She returned to her home at Santa Monica, and was still undergoing medical treatment at the time of the trial, which was eight months after the injuries were received.

The doctor who treated Mrs. Rannard testified very fully respecting the character, extent, and duration of her injuries, as follows: The nose was broken at the septum, and was permanently angulated to the left, and this disfigurement was permanent; there was an internal injury to the nose, narrowing the left nostril thereof, and it was very doubtful if an operation would relieve this condition; the muscles of the scalp had lost their nerve supply, so that she was unable to raise one eyebrow; and it was very doubtful if this condition could ever be cured; there was a comminuted fracture of her arm, the bone being broken up into several pieces; there was injury around the whole shoulder, and pain and loss of function in the shoulder joint; there was some loss of extension and loss of power in the right hand, and as a result of this she was unable to comb her hair because she could not get her hand up, and she could not reach up to turn on an electric light; the witness did not think the injury to the shoulder would ever be cured, and he stated that he believed she would always have some disability; there were scars on her forehead and nose; the pain which she had suffered, and the way she was pulled down physically, led up to a condition of nervousness and lack of nerve force which is known as "asthenia," which means simply the lack of nerve power and inability to do the things that an ordinarily normal person can do, and this condition might exist for a long time, and possibly there might never be a recovery therefrom. The foregoing testimony related to her condition at the time of the trial. In addition to this testimony, there is evidence showing severe physical and mental suffering. Her body was bruised all over by the accident. By reason of the facial disfigurements, she doubtless has suffered, and will continue to suffer, mortification and humiliation such as naturally comes to one of her sex by reason of permanent scars and the disfigurement of her nose.

[1, 2] The rule which should govern an appellate court in passing upon a question of this character is well stated in the case of Horn v. Yellow Cab Co., 88 Cal. App. 678, 263 P. 1025, 1026: "No two cases exactly alike are to be found, and consequently no absolute rule is applicable to all cases. Morgan v. Southern Pacific Co., 95 Cal. 501, 30 P. 601. Therefore, the only method of determining whether a verdict is excessive is by comparing the amount of damages awarded thereby with the evidence (Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513); and where the element of past and future pain is involved it is always difficult to fix the amount of damages which should be allowed therefor (Pedrow v. Federoff, 77 Cal. App. 164, 247 P. 212). The remedy for safeguarding against the danger of excessive verdicts is necessarily, to a great extent, committed to the judge who presides at the trial, because it is presumed that he will carefully weigh the evidence himself and not allow a verdict to stand if he believes that excessive damages have been awarded by the jury under the influence of passion or prejudice; and it is only in cases where the excess appears as a matter of law, or where the recovery is so grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice or at first blush raises a presumption that it is the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than honest and sober judgment, that a reviewing court is justified in interfering. Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 P. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50; Pedrow v. Federoff, supra; 8 Cal. Jur. 834."

The wisdom for the rule declared in the foregoing cases is instantly apparent in the case at bar. It may be said that we have all the evidence before us. This is not strictly correct. While our powers of visualization may be ever so keen, only the jury who saw Mrs. Rannard could adequately pass upon the extent, character, and effect of the disfigurement to her face—the angulated nose, the scars, and the eyebrow which was bereft of nerve control. A view of the person so afflicted would be of great evidentiary value to a court or jury in fixing the compensation to be awarded. This is also true of the effect of the injuries upon the general health of the wife. Her general appearance and the manner in which she moved about the courtroom—all such matters have no adequate presentation in the record. It is for such reasons as these that our appellate courts have committed to the trial court or jury the practically exclusive function of fixing the amount of damages.

[3] In view of the facts narrated, showing that the injuries received by Mrs. Rannard were of a distressing and serious character, and showing also that a great amount of pain and suffering and some permanent injuries, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the verdict was excessive.

[4] It is contended by appellants that the award of $2,000 to the husband for loss of his wife's services is also excessive. The wife, the evidence shows, had been unable to perform her duties in the home since the accident, and it was reasonably certain that she would never be able to do the work which she had previously done. From the very nature of the case, the husband's loss is not susceptible of direct proof. Meek v. Pac. Elec. Ry., 175 Cal. 53, 164 P. 1117. Here also we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the amount thus awarded is excessive under the rule laid down in the cases cited.

Upon denying the motion for new trial, the court rendered an opinion. It is contended that in this opinion the trial court used language which indicated that the court "abused its discretion and failed to perform the duty enjoined upon it by law in the matter of eradicating or curbing excessive verdicts," thus bringing the case within the rule declared in the case of Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 469, 205 P. 1073, 1075, where the trial court rendered the following opinion in denying the motion for new trial: "I consider the verdict and judgment excessive, but the appellate court is better able from its wide experience to reduce it to the proper amount than I."

The judgment was reversed upon the ground that it was the duty of the trial court, if it considered the judgment excessive, to provide for its reduction or grant a new trial. It is there stated that "practically, the trial court must bear the whole responsibility in every case. The power of appellate courts over excessive damages exists only when the facts are such as to suggest, at first blush, passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury."

In the instant case, there is no language used by the trial court which would indicate that it considered the damages excessive, nor is any such contention made by appellants.

[5] The final ground urged for reversal is the giving of the following instruction: "In addition to such damages, if you find for the plaintiffs and if you find from the evidence that plaintiff A. B. Rannard as a result of the serious injury suffered by his wife, etc. * * *"

It is argued that this is an instruction upon the facts, in that it told the jury that the injury was "serious." This contention is without merit. In his argument to the jury, counsel for defendants said: "Now the main question in this case is to determine what Mrs. Rannard should have at your hands. There is no question about the physical injuries which Mrs. Rannard had received, as testified to by the doctors who examined her. She was severely hurt. It was a very serious accident. It is very fortunate that she was not killed. * * * You know, it has been a little better than eight months since Mrs. Rannard met with this serious accident. Not at all surprising that she should be in this condition. It is really a remarkable recovery to this point when you consider how seriously she was injured."

Assuming that the jury were instructed that the injury was serious, no possible prejudice could result to defendants when their own counsel admitted to the jury that such was the fact. Furthermore, the only inference which could be drawn from the testimony adduced would be to the effect that the injuries received by the wife were serious. The only question presented here is how serious the injuries were.

[6, 7] The record, appellants contend, contains evidence which indicates that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion for new trial. Attempting to uphold this view, they point out that the introduction of certain evidence (to which they did not object) tended to inflame the minds of the jurors. The clothing which the wife wore at the time of the accident was permitted, without objection, to go before the jury. There was some blood thereon. Not only was such evidence admissible, but, having failed to object to its introduction, defendants cannot now be heard to complain in respect thereto. The same contention is made as to other testimony introduced by respondents, but no question is raised as to its admissibility, and no objection was made to its introduction. Under such conditions, appellants are foreclosed from making any attack thereon. We might add, that we are of the opinion that the testimony and evidence of which appellants complain was clearly admissible. We therefore hold that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for new trial.

The record in this case is remarkably free from error, and there is nothing to indicate that the amount awarded was arrived at in any manner other than that by a calm and dispassionate consideration of the evidence by the jury. There is nothing in the record pointing to any extraneous influences being brought to bear upon the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

MACHADO v. HARM et al.

Civ. 285.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 23, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 22, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 21, 1931.

1. Damages ⟹158(2).

Where there is general allegation of bodily injury and resulting damage, testimony regarding any injuries that might naturally result therefrom is admissible.

2. Damages ⟹143.

Defendant need not allege specifically his physical injuries sustained or which might have resulted from accident.

3. Damages ⟹158(1).

Under pleadings in personal injury action, court properly admitted evidence of permanent injuries other than injury to eye.

Complaint alleged plaintiff was thrown out of automobile and suffered fracture of frontal bone back of eye, injury to leg, and received shock to nervous system and bruises and contusions to extent causing great pain for 60 days and that eye was permanently injured. Evidence was admitted that there had been linear fracture of frontal bone and cerebral hemorrhage and that plaintiff was unconscious approximately eighteen hours, that there was injury to optic nerve which was permanent, and that plaintiff complained of dizziness occurring several times a day and headaches which would never be any better.

4. Damages ⟹216(4).

Instruction regarding damages for pain and suffering held not erroneous.

Instruction stated that damages for pain and suffering are to be fixed by jury as their discretion dictates and which may be reasonable and proper, and that jury might make such estimated damages from facts and circumstances and evidence by considering them in connection with their own knowledge and experience in affairs of life. Immediately thereafter court instructed that from all elements stated in instruction jury would resolve what sum would fairly compensate plaintiff for injury and loss sustained by him, not in excess of amount prayed for in complaint.

5. Damages ⟹216(1).

In personal injury action, portion of instruction to resolve what sum would fairly compensate plaintiff for injury and loss sustained, not, however, in excess of amount prayed for, held not erroneous.

6. Damages ⟹173(1).

In personal injury action, testimony regarding plaintiff's earning capacity held proper.

7. Appeal and error ⟹932(1).

Where jury returned verdict for lump sum, appellate court would presume jury did not take special damages into consideration.

In personal injury action, although evidence of special damages of ambulance and doctor bills was submitted and plaintiff was permitted to testify regarding his earning capacity before accident, no evidence was offered as to other items of damage which were specially pleaded, and jury returned a verdict for a lump sum.

8. Damages ⟹132(14).

$17,500 to business man 31 years old sustaining fractured skull and concussion of brain, permanent injuries to eye, optic nerve, injuries to leg, profound shock to nervous system and bruises and contusions upon body, causing great pain for 60 days, held not excessive.

9. Appeal and error ⟹1005(2).

On appeal, decision of trial court and jury on damages cannot be set aside unless verdict is so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on jury's part.

10. Trial ⟹296(3).

In automobile collision case, instruction that defendant was negligent if he violated statute held not erroneous, construed with other instructions (St. 1923, p. 557, § 122, and p. 553, § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30).

Immediately after instruction that, if defendant violated St. 1923, p. 557, § 122, defendant was negligent, court instructed that, if defendant violated St. 1923, p. 553, § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30, and if such violation had approximately contributed to happening of collision, then defendant was negligent, and immediately thereafter court gave two other instructions making it clear that any failure on defendant's part to observe law must have been proximate cause of accident before any verdict could be returned in favor of plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Manuel Machado against George G. Harm and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Ray W. Hays, of Fresno, for appellants.

M. S. Hamilton and Jesse E. Nichols, both of Oakland, and Fletcher A. Cutler and Ford & Johnson, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAMBERSON, Justice pro tem.

Action for damages for personal injuries resulting from a collision between a light truck driven by respondent and a heavy truck operated by appellant Withrow, as an employee of appellants Harm and Frasher.

The collision happened about 10 o'clock p. m. on March 9, 1928, and occurred on Eleventh street, which runs east and west in the city of Tracy, at a point between E and F streets.

The complaint alleged, in substance, that plaintiff was carefully operating an automobile in a westerly direction along and upon the northerly side of said Eleventh street when the defendants carelessly and negligently operated an automobile truck then and there the property of the defendants Harm and Frasher, in an easterly direction over and upon said northerly line of Eleventh street in such manner as to cause said automobile truck to violently and forcibly run into and collide with the automobile operated by plaintiff, thereby injuring plaintiff in the manner thereafter alleged.

The allegations of the complaint describing the injuries suffered by respondent were as follows: "That as a result of said collision, this plaintiff was thrown out of his automobile onto the paved highway with great violence and was cut over his left eye and suffered a fracture of his frontal bone back of his left eye, and his left leg was injured just below the knee; and was bruised and injured in other portions of his body; and received a profound shock to his nervous system and bruises and contusions upon his head, body and person to such an extent that said plaintiff suffered great pain for a period of sixty (60) days; that said plaintiff is informed and believes and upon such information and belief alleges that as a result of his said injuries the sight and vision of said left eye is permanently and seriously injured and that it may never be restored to its normal function and condition."

The complaint alleged that plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $50,000, and also set forth special damages amounting to a total sum of $659.30.

The appellant Withrow had stopped his 10-ton truck, to which was attached a 10-ton trailer, on the southerly side of Eleventh street, and had taken lunch across the street with a fellow employee who was driving another truck ahead of him. Following their meal, the men had returned to their trucks and the advance truck had proceeded out on the highway, while appellant, a few moments later, started his truck toward the center of the street. The respondent, who had delivered milk east of Tracy, was returning to his dairy and was driving west. He testified that he was proceeding on the right side of the center line of the street at a speed of between 17 and 18 miles per hour, and first saw the heavy truck approaching when about a block away, next saw the lights turn toward him, and applied his own brakes and his machine stopped immediately. He had no further recollection of the accident. An employee of the creamery followed respondent in another machine and saw the collision. He testified that the highway was 40 feet wide at the point of collision, and corroborated respondent's statement that the latter was traveling on the north side of the center line; that immediately after the collision the right front wheel of the heavy truck was almost on the center line of the street and the other front wheel was about 2 feet over such line, and a part of the truck beyond the wheels also extended over the center line; the heavy truck standing at an abrupt angle with such line. Police officers of the city of Tracy testified that the front wheels of the heavy truck were a distance of 3 or 4 feet on the north side of the center of the highway.

The jury returned a general verdict in favor of respondent in the sum of $17,500, and, after making a motion for a new trial, which was denied, the defendants appealed from the judgment.

No particular effort has been made to show that the evidence is insufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that the operator of the heavy truck was on the wrong side of the highway at the time of the collision and that injuries were sustained by respondent as a proximate result of the negligence of appellant Withrow. Any conflict in the evidence was resolved by the jury in favor of the respondent and in the absence of error cannot be disturbed by this court.

[1-3] Appellants urge that the court erred in admitting evidence of permanent injuries, other than the injury to respondent's eye. The attending physician testified that there had been a linear fracture of the frontal bone and cerebral hemorrhage, coming from within the skull at a point near the rear of the optic nerve; that the respondent was unconscious approximately 18 hours as a result of concussion; that there is an injury to the optic nerve which is permanent; that the respondent complained of dizziness occurring several times a day and headaches, and would never be any better. A specialist in eye disorders was permitted to testify that respondent had a little less than one-third vision in the injured eye; that there was a pressure along the optic nerve which had caused inflammation; that the power of accommodation of the eye was practically destroyed; and that his condition, at the time of the specialist's examination, would be his permanent condition.

The allegations of the complaint as to the nature of respondent's injuries have already been stated. Where there is a general allegation of bodily injury and resulting damage, testimony as to any injury which might naturally result therefrom is admissible. A plaintiff is not required to allege specifically each physical injury sustained or which might have resulted from an accident. It is sufficient if such injuries can be traced to the occurrence complained of and are such as might naturally result from the injury. Kuhns v. Marshall, 44 Cal. App. 588, 186 P. 632; Latky v. Wolfe, 85 Cal. App. 332, 259 P. 470; Samuels v. California Street Cable Ry. Co., 124 Cal. 294, 56 P. 1115; Martin v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 203 Cal. 291, 264 P. 246. In the instant case the complaint alleged several specific injuries, including the fracture of respondent's frontal bone back of the left eye, bruises and injuries in other portions of his body, and alleged that he received a profound shock to his nervous system. His allegation that he suffered great pain for a period of 60 days simply tends to describe the extent of the immediate suffering, and does not minimize the fact that the damage might naturally have resulted in permanent injuries suffered in the accident. Dizziness, vertigo, headaches, and defects in sight or vision, were results which might be expected to naturally flow from so serious an injury as a fracture of the skull and concussion of the brain, and the defendants must be presumed to be aware of the damages which would necessarily result from such an injury, and could not have been taken by surprise by proof of such resulting damage. Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 22 P. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175. The court committed no error in admitting testimony as to such injuries.

[4] Appellants contend that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "You are instructed that the law prescribes no definite measure of damages for pain or suffering, if any, sustained by an injured person, but leaves such damages to be fixed by you as your discretion dictates and under all circumstances may be reasonable and proper. It is not necessary, therefore, that any of the witnesses should have expressed an opinion as to the amount of such damages for pain or suffering alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, but the jury may make such estimated damages from the facts and circumstances and evidence by considering them in connection with their own knowledge and experience in the affairs of life."

Immediately thereafter the court gave the following instruction: "If your verdict is in favor of the plaintiff, in assessing damages that you should award him, you should take into consideration the character of the injuries, if any, sustained by him, the nature, extent and severity of the injuries sustained and whether the same are temporary or permanent in their character. In estimating the amount of such damages you may consider the physical and mental pain suffered, if any; the extent, nature and character of the suffering, mental or physical, if any, and its duration. You may also consider any physical or mental pain, if any, which you believe from the evidence that plaintiff is reasonably certain to suffer in the future. And from all of these elements, you will resolve what sum will fairly compensate him for the injury and loss sustained by him, not, however, in excess of the amount prayed for in the complaint, to wit, the sum of $50,659.30."

In the case of Litherbury v. Kimmet, 183 Cal. 24, at page 27, 195 P. 660, 661, a similar instruction was quoted and the court said: "Reading the two instructions together, and, as we have said, they were actually given immediately together, it is plain enough to a lawyer that the very general language of the second instruction given (the first quoted above) has reference to a recovery measured by the specific rule of the preceding instruction and is controlled by it. This, however, might well not be so plain to a body of men, such as a jury, not trained in the construction of instruments and who may hear the instructions only and not have the advantage of seeing them together on the written page. It would have been better if the danger of such misunderstanding of the true effect of the instructions had been avoided as could easily have been done. While the instructions are open, we believe, to criticism in this respect, still the danger or probability of their having been misconstrued is not so great as to justify us in this case in setting aside the verdict."

In the case of Wiley v. Young, 178 Cal. 681, 174 P. 316, 318, the following instruction was given: "You are instructed, however, that with regard to pain and suffering the law prescribes no definite measure of damages, but the law leaves such damages to be fixed by you as your discretion dictates, and as under all the circumstances may be just and proper."

This instruction was held to be correct, when coupled with the preceding instruction which was as follows: "If you find the defendant liable, you are instructed that the damage should be fixed at such an amount as will compensate plaintiff for such loss sustained by her as set forth by her in her complaint, and any injury that she will sustain in the future as is supported by the evidence."

The court said that the effect of such an instruction as a whole is that the plaintiff is entitled to compensatory damages only, and that the instruction with reference to the amount of damages for pain and suffering is elaborated for the purpose only of disclosing to the jury that it is not necessary that any particular witness should have fixed a particular amount as the damage for such pain and suffering. We think that the purport of the instructions in the present case, when taken together, was to make it plain to the jury that the jury should award such sum as would fairly compensate the respondent for the injury and loss sustained by him.

[5] Complaint is made of that portion of the second instruction which reads, "not, however, in excess of the amount prayed for in the complaint, to wit, the sum of $50,659.30." This particular form of instruction was discussed at considerable length and approved in the case of Ritzman v. Mills, 102 Cal. App. 464, 283 P. 88, in which a number of California cases are cited. The intent of such an instruction, when taken in connection with the other instructions, is to keep the jury from awarding an amount in excess of the damages claimed by the plaintiff.

Objection is made by appellant that the verdict was excessive, and attention is called to the fact that, while evidence of special damages was permitted, covering ambulance and doctor's bills, and the respondent was permitted to testify as to his earning capacity before the accident, no evidence was offered as to other items of damage which were specially pleaded, and the jury returned a verdict for a lump sum of $17,500, and it could not be determined whether or not the jury took the special damages into consideration.

[6] Allowance of testimony as to respondent's earning capacity was proper. Ehat v. Scheidt, 17 Cal. App. 430, 120 P. 49; Leiner v. Eng-Skell Co., 104 Cal. App. 228, 285 P. 905.

In the case of Worden v. Central Fireproof Building Co., 172 Cal. 94, at page 97, 155 P. 839, 840, the court said: "The complaint alleged that by reason of the injury he had suffered great physical pain, 'and will continue to suffer,' and that the alleged injury to his knee is permanent, 'all to his damage in the sum of $15,000.' This is a sufficient allegation of the damage and it includes whatever loss of earning power may have been caused by the permanent injury stated. Consequences which naturally follow from a personal injury, because of the nature of the injury, are general damages, and need not be specially pleaded in order to recover damages resulting therefrom."

In the case of Johnson v. Pearson, 100 Cal. App. 503, at page 508, 280 P. 394, 396, the court used the following language: "Furthermore, if there is no evidence to support a judgment for special damages, as appellant contends, there is, however, ample evidence in the record to support a judgment for $4,000 for general damages, and, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, we must presume that the sum awarded respondent of $4,000 is for injuries received and the pain and suffering endured, and nothing for special damages."

[7] We think that the trial court committed no error in its ruling upon the testimony as to earnings, and that it must be presumed that the jury did not take the special damages into consideration.

[8, 9] The injuries suffered by respondent have already been described and discussed. He was 31 years of age at the time of the accident, apparently in good health, and apparently operating a successful and fairly profitable business, and he suffered injuries which obviously rendered him less capable of doing the work that he had done before the accident. There is nothing tangible in the record which would render it necessary for us to say as a matter of law that the verdict was the result of passion or prejudice or to disturb the judgment of the trial court following the verdict of the jury. In the case of Reneau v. Hirsch, 88 Cal. App. 1, at page 6, 262 P. 1100, 1102, the court said: "The rule is well established that the amount of damages in this kind of an action is committed, first, to the sound discretion of the jury, and next to the discretion of the judge of the trial court, who, in ruling upon the motion for a new trial, may consider the evidence anew, determine anew the facts, and set aside the verdict if it is not just. Upon appeal, the decision of the trial court and the jury on the subject cannot be set aside unless the verdict is so plainly 'and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury' "—citing cases.

[10] Another objection on the part of appellants to be considered is that the jury was instructed by the court as to the provisions of section 122 of the Motor Vehicle Act of the state of California (St. 1923, p. 557), and that the instruction concluded with this charge: "If you believe from the evidence that he violated this provision of the Motor Vehicle Act then and in that event he was negligent." Immediately thereafter another instruction was given as to the provisions of section 113 of the Motor Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30), in which instruction it was stated that if the jury believed from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant Withrow violated this provision of the Motor Vehicle Act and that such violation, if any, proximately contributed to the happening of the collision in question, then he was negligent. Immediately thereafter the court gave two other instructions concerning the law of the state as to the driving of motor vehicles, in which the court made it clear that any failure on the part of the defendant to observe the law, if found by the jury, must have been the proximate cause of the accident before any verdict could be returned in favor of plaintiff. The court further instructed the jury that it is a presumption of law that the automobile being operated by the defendants was being operated in a lawful manner, and concluded with the following instruction: "The mere fact that an act or omission on the part of the defendants caused the collision in question, is not, in itself, sufficient to support a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. To render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff you must find that the defendants were guilty of negligence and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries complained of, and further, that the plaintiff was without any fault that in the slightest degree contributed proximately to the injuries of which he complains, otherwise, your verdict must be for the defendants."

The court also instructed the jury as to what effect contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff should have in the jury's consideration of the case. Taking the instructions together, we think it was made clear to the jury that any negligence on the part of the defendant arising by operation of law must have been the proximate cause of the injury before the jury could find against the defendant. An instruction similar in all respects to the one first given in the present case was given in the case of Sartori v. Granucci, 204 Cal. 28, 266 P. 280, but it may be said that, while the instruction was brought directly to the attention of the Supreme Court, the objection made was not on the same grounds as that made here. It has been held in a number of cases, however, that it is proper for the trial court to instruct the jury that a violation of an express provision of the law constitutes negligence per se. Mathes v. Aggeler & Musser Seed Co., 179 Cal. 697, 178 P. 713; Dewhirst v. Leopold, 194 Cal. 424, 229 P. 30; Towne v. Godeau, 70 Cal. App. 148, 232 P. 1010; Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 277 P. 1045; Kelley v. Hodge Transportation System, 197 Cal. 598, 242 P. 76.

The issues to be decided by the jury were fully and fairly presented to them by the instructions, and, if the instruction complained of, standing by itself, tended to prejudice the appellant's case, such prejudice was cured by other instructions given by the court. A complete review of the instructions would necessitate more space being devoted to the matter than is justified.

It is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: MARKS, Acting P. J.; JENNINGS, J.

CARR v. BANK OF ITALY.

Civ. 6529.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

March 24, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 22, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 21, 1931.

1. Trusts ⟹30½(1).

Where parties adopted plan imperfect in its operation, equity could not convert it into perfect one by imputing trust, where trust was not contemplated.

2. Trusts ⟹44(2).

Under evidence showing purchaser of property deposited check with bank under written instructions to deliver it on written instructions from purchaser, no trust relationship existed, and bank paying out part of money under court order was not liable to vendor.

> Vendor and purchasers of theater went to bank for purpose of opening escrow, but vendor was unable to give good description of chattel mortgage, and escrow clerk told parties matter could not be handled through escrow, and at his suggestion an instruction was drawn up to effect that purchaser handed bank check to hold until bank received certain chattel mortgage upon which it should indorse payment in amount of check, and that check was not to be delivered until bank received written instructions from purchaser. Thereafter bank was restrained in action in which purchaser was defendant from honoring check, and part of the amount of such deposit deposited was ordered paid on judgment rendered for plaintiff in that action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Louise B. Carr against the Bank of Italy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Haas & Dunnigan and Walter F. Haas, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William P. Mealey, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff and one Rockhill were the owners of a certain motion picture theater in Los Angeles, together with the furniture, pictures, etc., used in connection therewith. Plaintiff was the owner of a promissory note in the sum of $10,000 secured by a chattel mortgage on all of the personal property in the theater.

On July 20, 1926, plaintiff and Rockhill sold to one George Landers and his associate the theater and personal property for an agreed price, $8,000 of which was to be paid in cash and credited on the chattel mortgage. Landers and his associate Oscar Oberndorff, together with Rockhill, went to the Pico Heights branch of the defendant bank for the purpose of opening an escrow. At that time the chattel mortgage was in the east in the possession of a relative of plaintiff, being held as security for money advanced, and Rockhill was not able to give a good description of it. The escrow clerk thereupon told the parties that in his opinion the matter could not be handled through escrow. Oberndorff then said that they had "to get this money in the bank some way," to which the clerk replied that he could make a suggestion. The parties then told him that he should know his business, and that whatever he suggested would be all right with them. The result was that the escrow clerk drew up an instruction which was handed to Mr. Landers with the suggestion that he pass it on to Rockhill, the clerk saying to Landers that if it met with his (Landers') approval, and he would sign it, a cashier's check in the amount named would be obtained for him and held in accordance with the instruction. The instruction was then signed by Landers, who gave the clerk his check for $8,000, and a cashier's check was then drawn for such amount in favor of Landers. The instruction read as follows:

"Bank of Italy, Pico Heights Branch, Los Angeles, California

"I the undersigned hand you herewith Cashier's check No. 334035 for $8000.00. You are to hold this check until you receive a certain chattel mortgage upon which you will indorse a payment of $8000.00. This check is not to be delivered until you receive written instructions from the undersigned.

"George H. Landers."

Both the check and the signed instruction were then left with the bank. The evidence is conflicting as to whether or not the cashier's check was indorsed by Landers then or later when it was cancelled. On August 14, 1926, Landers and Mr. Carr, the husband and agent of plaintiff, went to the bank, and the $8,000 check was canceled and the sum of $584 was paid to Mr. Carr, Landers' receipt therefor being taken by the bank, and another cashier's check in Landers' favor was written for the balance, $7,416, at which time the number of the first cashier's check and the amount thereof were erased from the instruction and the number of the second check, 334209, and the amount, $7,416, were written therein in their place.

The chattel mortgage at this time had not arrived. Thereafter, and before it did arrive, the defendant bank was restrained in a certain action pending in the superior court, in which Landers and Oberndorff were defendants, from honoring any checks, drafts, or orders of Landers or Oberndorff or from paying out any moneys on drafts, orders, or checks held by said bank for the account of either of said parties, on the theory that the money deposited in the defendant bank and which went to make up the cashier's check so deposited, to the amount of $4,000, at least, belonged to the plaintiff in said action. After such order was made, by stipulation of the parties to that action, $4,500 was taken out of the cashier's check for $7,416 and deposited with the bank in the name of Oberndorff, to be held by the bank pending a determination of said action, leaving a balance of $2,916 in the form of a cashier's check in favor of Landers, which, on August 20, 1926, was deposited with defendant bank under an instruction similar to the first one given. On August 21, it having then arrived, Landers inspected the chattel mortgage, and the cashier's check for the balance of $2,916, indorsed by Landers, was given to Mr. Carr. There is testimony to the effect that the officer of the bank was told that possession of the theater was to be immediately given to the purchasers. The $4,500 was eventually ordered paid on the judgment rendered for the plaintiff in the action in which the restraining order was issued. This suit was brought by plaintiff against the bank for the $4,500, on the theory that the bank accepted the check for $8,000 and agreed to hold the same for plaintiff pending the production of the chattel mortgage, and that it failed so to do. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff the defendant appeals.

[1, 2] It is appellant's contention that the check in question remained at all times subject to the disposition of Landers, and that it was error for the trial court to permit the introduction of evidence which varied the terms of the written instruction accompanying its deposit. Respondent urges that, when the deposit of the check was accepted by the bank, it became a trustee for the benefit of respondent, and that the evidence was properly admitted to show the real intention of the parties.

Both parties admit that there was no escrow, and there could hardly be a contention that there was in view of the testimony on the subject. The parties wanted to form one, but the bank refused to make an escrow. Nor does respondent contend that the writing itself creates the trust alleged in the complaint. That is evident from the fact that respondent sought to introduce evidence extrinsic to it to show the intent of the parties. The real contention is that the acceptance of the draft, knowing that it was to be a part of the purchase price of the theater and knowing that possession was to be given immediately to the purchasers, implies a trust that the bank would not permit the draft to be used for any other purpose. The parties had no intention of making a deposit of the money in trust when they went into the bank. They intended to form an escrow. The bank refused it and the escrow clerk made a suggestion of a way that the money could be handled, which was adopted. A draft was purchased for the amount by Landers, not in the name of respondent, but in his own name, and that was deposited with the bank, not as the property of the bank, but as Landers' property. The instructions were not that it was to be delivered to respondent when the bank was satisfied that the amount of the chattel mortgage and the rate of payments were as understood by Landers at the time, but that it was not to be delivered "until you receive written instructions." The name of respondent does not appear in the instruction. The chattel mortgage upon which the bank is to "endorse a payment of $8000.00" is not described. The instruction is Landers'. The check is his, whether it was indorsed by him at the time of deposit or at the time of cancellation. When it was canceled and a small payment made to respondent or her agent, the new check was made in Landers' name and a receipt for the payment taken from Landers and not from Carr. At no time, apparently, was the chattel mortgage or note actually received by the bank. So it was clearly not the intention of the escrow clerk when he suggested the arrangement to make the bank a trustee of the check for the benefit of respondent or to do anything more than make it the depository of the check and Landers' agent to deliver it to whom and when instructed so to do by its owner, Landers. There was no relation of personal confidence or trust toward respondent assumed by the bank that we can see, and its rejection of the parties' offer to form an escrow, because of the fact that they could not give the escrow clerk a more definite description of the chattel mortgage and note, negatives any intention of assuming an even greater responsibility, or of any intention on the part of Landers and respondent to have the bank do so.

The case of Sayer v. Wynkoop, 248 N. Y. 54, 161 N. E. 417, 418, speaking of cases where a third party received money for one with whom it was deposited by the owner, says: "In all these cases * * * there appears to have been an express promise on the part of the person receiving the moneys to pay them over, or an acknowledgment by him that the moneys were received to be held in trust for such third person. However, it is apparent that the intention of the owner, and not that of the receiver, is controlling upon the question whether title to the moneys has been transferred and a trust has been created. True, there must be an assumption of the trust duty by the receiver, but that may arise through implication as well as through expression." Here everything that was done repels the thought that either Landers or the bank or respondent had any intention of creating a trust.

The Supreme Court in the case of Noble v. Learned, 153 Cal. 245, 94 P. 1047, 1049, says: "The contention appears to be that Noble was constituted a trustee of the shares or the certificates for the benefit of Mrs. Lee during her life, and of the parties named in the various indorsements after her death. By the creation of an express voluntary trust for the benefit of third persons the title or estate in the property, which is the subject of the trust, so far as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of the trust, is vested in the trustee. This is implied in the very nature of the term 'trust.' 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 858; Civ. Code §§ 5863, 2250. It is plain, however, that the transactions above recited did not operate to convey to Noble any title whatever to the 40 shares or to the certificate. The written assignment of the shares, if operative at all, could be effective only to transfer title to the assignee, Mrs. Learned. * * * It follows that the transaction cannot be given the effect claimed, i. e., of making Noble a trustee." Assuming, without deciding, that parol evidence was properly admitted in the instant case, the only conflict in it appears to be whether or not the various checks deposited were indorsed by Landers at the time of deposit or at the time of cancellation. But regardless of when they were indorsed, the only conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that the bank was to hold each check until it was authorized by Landers to deliver it. No title thereto was given the bank and no right to do anything with it except upon Landers' direction; and we fail to see how any trust could arise where no trust is imposed. In that respect there is a similarity between the Noble Case and the one now before us.

"A person holding property, real or personal and intending to make a voluntary disposition thereof for the benefit of another, may do so in either one of three modes: 1. He may make a simple conveyance or assignment of it directly to the donee, so as to vest in the latter whatever interest and title the donor has, without the intervention of any trust. 2. He may make a transfer of it to a third person upon trusts declared in favor of the donee. 3. He may retain the title and declare himself a trustee for the donee, and thus clothe the donee with the beneficial estate. By either of these modes, if the transaction is imperfect and executory, equity will not aid to enforce it; and if the intention of the party is to adopt one of the methods, a court of equity will not resort to either of the other methods for the purpose of carrying it into effect. * * * If the donor adopts the second or third, he need not use any technical words, or language in express terms creating or declaring a trust, but he must employ language which shows unequivocally an intention on his part to create a trust in a third person, or to declare a trust in himself." Pom. Eq. Jur. (4th Ed.) § 997. The language used here does not show such necessary unequivocal intention to create a trust, in our opinion. There is no question but that the parties would, under the advice of a lawyer, have made a deposit of the check under circumstances that would have placed it beyond the power of a creditor of Landers, or any one claiming a part of the fund as his own, to reach, but we cannot assume that the parties were expecting the bank to practice law or to do anything more than make a suggestion of plans which they themselves in their own discretion might adopt; and having adopted a plan so suggested, which was imperfect in its operation, equity cannot convert it into a perfect one by imputing "a trust where a trust was not in contemplation." Trubey v. Pease, 240 Ill. 513, 88 N. E. 1005, 1008, 16 Ann. Cas. 370.

As we view the evidence, and assuming, without deciding, that it was properly admitted, the only conclusion that could be drawn therefrom is that no trust relationship existed; that the cashier's check belonged at all times to Landers and could not be held by the bank against the order and judgment of the court which diminished it by the sum of $4,500, and that in consequence there is no liability on the part of the bank to respondent. We might also add that it appears from the evidence that the contract with Landers and Oberndorff for the purchase of the theater, together with the $3,500 paid by them, was declared forfeited, and the theater was sold to other parties subject, so far as plaintiff's share is concerned, to the unpaid balance of her chattel mortgage; so plaintiff would not seem to be in any worse financial condition than she was before.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by George Smith MacGruer and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of MacGruer & Simpson, against Paul E. Denivelle. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Vincent Surr and Clarence E. Todd, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

John Guthrie Heywood, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action for maliciously obtaining an injunction. The respondent, Denivelle, had been in the imitation travertine business in Eastern States; about 1912 he became the supervisor of all artificial travertine work for the Panama Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco. At such time the appellants MacGruer and Simpson (copartners) had a contract for plain and ornamental plastering on Machinery Hall, one of the Panama Pacific International Exposition buildings. During this period appellants informed respondent that they had a contract to do a large artificial travertine job in Los Angeles, whereupon respondent threatened to prevent the appellants from further manufacturing artificial travertine, claiming such manufacture to be an infringement of a patent then held by respondent. Subsequently, appellants started the work in Los Angeles and respondent secured a preliminary injunction from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, Southern Division, upon the grounds that Denivelle was the sole and exclusive owner of United States letter patent (No. 1,212,-331); that said letters patent had theretofore been adjudged good and valid in law; that MacGruer and Simpson were infringing upon the letters patent by practicing for profit, without license, the process claimed in and patented by the letters patent in using and selling the product claimed therein. A simulation of Roman travertine limestone was the process of the patent referred to in the injunction proceedings. The decision in Los Angeles Lime Co. and Paul E. Denivelle v. Nye and the same plaintiffs v. Ceriat (C. C. A.) 270 F. 155, had sustained the validity of this patent, but in the injunction proceedings against MacGruer and Simpson, upon evidence not introduced in the previous cases, the court decided: "In the instant suit, however, the evidence is widely variant from that in the former suit, and requires a contrary decision. It now appears that claims 9 and 10 for the product of the process, were added to the application theretofore filed, by amendment without oath. The application was for a process alone, neither disclosed nor claimed invention of its product, and the absence of an oath avoids the patent to the extent of said claims. * * * More than two years' public use having been clearly established, the burden was plaintiff's to prove by full, unequivocal and convincing evidence that the use was experimental only. * * * Therein he failed." On appeal the Circuit Court of Appeals decided: "We conclude that the patent is invalid for the reason that more than two years prior to plaintiff's application for the patent he had placed the process and product of the invention on sale, and had sold both the process and product to the Pennsylvania Tunnel and Terminal Railroad Company for a profit."

The present action was shortly thereafter filed in which MacGruer and Simpson allege that by reason of "said malicious obtaining of said injunction" they were damaged by the loss of profits in the sum of $150,000. The complaint alleges that "Denivelle in his application for said patent made a false oath"; "that more than two years prior to the filing of said application for said patent said defendant Denivelle had placed the process and product of the said invention on sale in the United States and had sold in the United States both the process and the product for profit;" that "although at said time he well knew that said patent was void, invalid and of no force or effect, maliciously and without probable cause filed a bill of complaint," etc. The court rendered judgment for the defendant.

[1, 2] Appellants contend that the decision in Denivelle against MacGruer, supra, is res judicata and constitutes conclusive proof that Denivelle never had a patent and knew that he never had and that the state court was without power to try this issue. The decisions in Denivelle against MacGruer did not determine that Denivelle made a false oath or that he knew that he never had a valid patent. The decisions simply determined that the patent was invalid. The whole opinion in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, Southern Division, may be epitomized in the following quotation: "More than two years' public use having been clearly established, the burden was plaintiff's to prove a full, unequivocal and convincing evidence that the use was experimental only. * * * Therein he failed." On appeal the Circuit Court affirmed the lower court, but there is no holding that Denivelle made a false oath or that "he knew that he never had a patent." On the subject of res judicata, appellants cite many authorities with which we agree in principle, namely, that judicially determined matters cannot again be the subject of legal controversy between the same parties, but the questions herein involved were not judicially determined. In the United States Court the question was the validity of a patent, and not whether Denivelle made a false oath.

The main question to determine here is the issue, Did Denivelle, knowing his patent to be void, without probable cause, maliciously and with intent to injure MacGruer and Simpson, procure a preliminary injunction wherein they were enjoined and restrained from using, et cetera, the artificial stone embodying the invention of the claimed letters patent?

[3] "'Probable cause' has sometimes been defined as reasonable cause * * *; and in the case of both civil and criminal prosecutions has been further defined to be an honest suspicion or belief on the part of the instigator thereof, founded upon facts sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in believing that the charge is true." Black v. Knight, 44 Cal. App. 756, 769, 187 P. 89, 94.

[4-7] The fact that a party may fail to sustain an action does not in and of itself constitute want of probable cause, and no inference may be drawn from that fact alone that there was a want of probable cause. Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 157 Cal. 333, 107 P. 611; McKenna v. Heinlen, 128 Cal. 97, 60 P. 668; 16 Cal. Jur., p. 750, § 17. Probable cause is a question of fact to be determined from all of the circumstances surrounding the institution of the original proceeding. The proof of want of probable cause is upon the party so alleging. At the conclusion of such evidence, the opposing party may interpose the defense of probable cause. Levy v. Brannan, 39 Cal. 485; 16 Cal. Jur., p. 748, § 16.

[8] In the present case the trial court found that there was probable cause for the filing of the injunction proceedings. To approve that finding we need only refer to the fact that, prior to the filing of the MacGruer injunction application, these same patents had been declared valid by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in Los Angeles Lime Co. and Paul E. Denivelle v. C. L. Nye, and the same plaintiffs v. Ceriat, 270 F. 155. A successful determination of an issue rather indicates probable cause for bringing a second suit, notwithstanding that in the last action the same conclusion may not be maintained. See Dowdell v. Carpy, 129 Cal. 168, 61 P. 948.

[9, 10] "The general rule is well settled in this state, following the common-law doctrine, that no action for damages can be prosecuted against a plaintiff in an action from the fact per se that the action was unsuccessful or abated. The action must have been prosecuted maliciously and without probable cause, or the plaintiff cannot be made liable for bringing it." Vesper v. Crane Co., 165 Cal. 36, 41, 130 P. 876, 878, L. R. A. 1915A, 541. The two essentials, malice and want of probable cause, must appear from the evidence or the action must fall. Malice is the basis of the action, and we will therefore consider that question as applied to this case.

[11-13] Actual malice is an element in the cause of the action. Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, 204 P. 578. Malice refers to the condition of mind; first, that bad faith exists or a want of sincere belief that the cause is a proper cause, and, second, an intent to injure. Griswold v. Griswold, 143 Cal. 617, 77 P. 672. Malice is a question of fact. Burke v. Watts, supra. The trial court found that there was no malice on the part of the respondent in prosecuting or in procuring the issuance of the preliminary injunction.

[14, 15] It appears from the evidence that Denivelle knew from one of the employees of MacGruer and Simpson that the travertine plaster was a distinct process from any known to Denivelle. It was admitted by the respondent herein that he had been told that MacGruer and Simpson were using calcium carbide in their process, but he also testified: "When I received these samples, I could not tell whether they were made by the use of calcium carbide for the purpose of making voids in the material. * * * I presumed they were made by the process covered by my patents, naturally. * * * I now believe that they infringed my patent as much as I did at the time I brought the suit." A defendant in an action for maliciously securing an injunction may testify directly as to his motive and good faith. Runo v. Williams, 162 Cal. 444, 122 P. 1082. The trial court was justified from the foregoing and other evidence in finding that the defendant did not maliciously or with intent to injure plaintiffs move for a preliminary injunction. Appellants failed by the test of a preponderance of evidence to prove that respondent, maliciously and without probable cause, obtained the preliminary injunction, and hence the judgment for defendants will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

CHANDLER et al. v. CHANDLER.

Civ. 557.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 16, 1931.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing April 15, 1931.

1. Appeal and error 🔑35.

Order holding that community funds applied by decedent to improvement of his separate property became his separate property held appealable.

2. Appeal and error 🔑544(1).

Where only question raised is whether order is supported by findings, appeal may be taken on judgment roll alone.

3. Appeal and error 🔑671(1).

Papers shown in transcript held sufficient to present question whether community funds applied by decedent to improvement of separate property constituted his separate property.

> The papers shown in the transcript, although they could not technically be called a judgment roll, were in nature of judgment roll consisting of report of the inheritance tax appraiser, the objections thereto, the petition for partial distribution, the answer thereto, the findings of fact and conclusions of law, the order made and entered by trial court, and notice of appeal. The transcript was certified by the clerk of court as containing true copies of original records in his office of the matters named "constituting the judgment roll in said matter."

4. Trial 🔑404(2).

Purported conclusion of law that community funds were used by husband for improvement of his separate property held finding of fact.

5. Husband and wife 🔑258.

Definite amount of community funds applied by husband to improvement of separate property did not become husband's separate property, in absence of showing wife consented thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. A. Leonard, Judge.

Ira J. Chandler and another filed petition for a partial distribution of the estate of Guy B. Chandler, deceased, to which Christina Chandler, individually and as administratrix of the estate of Guy B. Chandler, deceased, filed answer. The proceeding was consolidated by consent of parties for hearing, with petitioners' objections to report of appointed inheritance tax appraiser and appraiser for the estate. From the portion of the order holding that the community funds applied by decedent to his separate property became merged in such separate property, Christina Chandler, individually and as administratrix, appeals.

Portion of order appealed from reversed, with directions.

See, also, 297 P. 638.

Harry Lyons, of Los Angeles, and Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

D. Joseph Coyne, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BARNARD, P. J.

Guy B. Chandler died intestate, leaving, among other things, three pieces of real property which are described in the inventory and appraisement as parcels 1, 2, and 3. His heirs at law and next of kin are a son and a daughter by a former marriage, who are petitioners and respondents in this matter, and his widow, who is administratrix of his estate and the appellant herein. A return and report having been filed by a duly appointed inheritance tax appraiser and appraiser for the estate, these petitioners filed objections thereto, and they also filed a petition for a partial distribution of said estate. The widow, individually and as administratrix filed an answer to said petition for partial distribution. By consent of the parties, these two matters were consolidated for hearing, and were tried and heard at the same time. The question presented at this hearing was whether the estate left by the decedent was his separate property, or whether it was the community property of himself and his wife. After a hearing, the court made findings by which it was found and adjudicated that the entire estate, except parcel 3 above referred to, was and is community property; that the said parcel 3 was the separate property of the decedent; that $11,021.58 of the community funds had been applied by the deceased toward paying off an incumbrance against said parcel 3 and in putting improvements thereon; that said amount so used in improving parcel 3 had lost its community character, and has become, and now is, merged in the separate property of the decedent; and that the whole of said parcel 3, with the improvements thereon, is the separate property of the decedent. From the portion of this order holding that the community funds thus applied by decedent to the benefit and improvement of his separate property had become merged in such separate property, and that the whole of said parcel 3, with the improvements thereon, constituted his separate property, the widow has taken this appeal.

[1-3] The respondents first contend that this appeal may not be considered, for the reason that no proper record is before this court; it being insisted that there is neither a properly settled bill of exceptions nor a clerk's transcript accompanied by a reporter's transcript. The transcript before us consists of the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, the objections thereto, the petition for a partial distribution, the answer thereto, the findings of fact and conclusions of law, the order made and entered by the trial court, and the notice of appeal. It is certified by the clerk of the court as containing true copies of the original records in his office of the papers named, "constituting the judgment roll in said matter." The order made was an appealable order. The only question raised by appellant is a question of law, as to whether the portion of the order appealed from is supported by the findings made. In such a case, an appeal may be taken upon the judgment roll alone. While the papers shown in the transcript here may not technically be called a judgment roll, they are in the nature of a judgment roll, and are sufficient to present the question raised. In re Ryer, 110 Cal. 556, 42 P. 1082.

[4] Respondents also insist that the court made no finding of fact to the effect that community funds to the amount of $11,021.58 had been used and applied by the deceased, to the benefit and improvement of said parcel 3, although they admit that statements to that effect are set forth under the heading of "Conclusions of Law." The record shows that one instrument was filed, headed "Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law," which later contains the heading "Conclusions of Law," and under that heading appears the matter which is here questioned. While so headed, the court actually finds that such community funds amounting to $11,021.58 were used and applied for the benefit and improvement of parcel 3, and then, as a conclusion of law, holds that such funds have lost their community character and have become merged in the separate property of the deceased. Regardless of its inclusion under the separate heading of "Conclusions of Law," this was a finding of fact. Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 103 P. 889, 19 Ann. Cas. 1207; Stanward v. Yellow Taxi Cab Co., 75 Cal. App. 96, 241 P. 902.

[5] The only question raised by appellant is whether or not a definite and ascertained amount of community property applied by a husband to the benefit and improvement of his separate property becomes the separate property of the husband, where nothing else appears except the fact that it was so used. This question was decided in the case of Provost v. Provost, 102 Cal. App. 775, 283 P. 842, 844, and we see no reason, either upon principle or authority, to hold otherwise. In that case, the court, after reviewing a number of cases in which it has been held that, where a husband uses community property to improve the separate property of his wife, the title to the improvements follows the land, points out that such cases are based upon the proposition that, since the husband has control of the community funds, if he voluntarily annexes them to the separate property of the wife, he will be presumed to have intended that the improvements thus made are to become a part of her separate property. The court then says: "To merely state a case where the facts are reversed and the husband has spent community funds in improving his own separate estate is to make manifest the palpable impropriety of applying these decided cases as precedents for holding that, simply because community property is annexed to the separate property of one of the spouses, the whole is thereby for all purposes the separate property of that spouse. Since the facts are reversed, logic compels the conclusion that the community funds do not merge in the separate property where the husband has, without consent of the wife, improved his own separate property with that belonging to the community. To hold otherwise would be to permit the authority of the husband in controlling the community property, given him in the interest of greater freedom in its use and for its transfer for the benefit of both himself and his wife, to become a weapon to be used by him to rob her of every vestige of interest in the community property with which the law has expressly invested her. Such a conclusion would violate every sense of justice, and outrage every principle of fair dealing, known to the law."

In our opinion, it was error for the trial court, after finding that a definite and fixed amount from the community funds had been applied to the benefit and improvement of the separate property of the decedent, to hold that such funds had lost their community character and were merged into the separate property of the decedent; there being nothing to show that the wife had consented thereto.

The portion of the order appealed from is reversed.

March 16, 1931.

1. Executors and administrators ⟹339.

Statute requiring five days' notice of trial of issues of fact held not applicable to administratrix' petition to mortgage estate property (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 594, 1578).

2. Executors and administrators ⟹339.

Where due notice had been given of administratrix' petition for permission to mortgage estate property, court had jurisdiction, although adversaries elected not to be present at hearing (Code Civ. Proc. § 1578).

3. Appeal and error ⟹909(4).

In absence of contrary showing, appellate court presumes that formal statements of trial court showing formal hearing on administratrix' petition to mortgage estate property were true.

> The order granting permission to mortgage recited that it was made in open court; that it came on regularly to be heard; and, after reciting that it further satisfactorily appearing to the court, the order proceeded to set forth facts which justified the making of the mortgage petitioned for.

4. Appeal and error ⟹909(4).

Court's statement that certain facts satisfactorily appeared at hearing held in open court raised presumption that facts appeared by proper evidence.

5. Executors and administrators ⟹342.

Jurisdiction of court to make order permitting estate property to be mortgaged is not dependent on administratrix' filing of account (Code Civ. Proc. § 1628).

6. Appeal and error ⟹909(4).

In absence of contrary evidence, appellate court assumed that finding that administratrix had filed account was correct (Code Civ. Proc. § 1628).

That prior petition of administratrix to mortgage was never acted on did not affect court's jurisdiction to hear subsequent petition properly noticed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. A. Leonard, Judge.

Christina Chandler, individually and as administratrix of the estate of Guy B. Chandler, deceased, filed petition for permission to mortgage certain property belonging to the estate, to which Ira J. Chandler and another filed answer and objections. From order granting permission to mortgage, Ira J. Chandler and another appeal.

Affirmed.

BARNARD, P. J.

Guy B. Chandler died intestate, and his estate is in the course of administration in the superior court of San Bernardino county. His widow is administratrix of the estate, and two children by a former marriage are appellants herein.

The respondent administratrix filed a petition for permission to mortgage certain property belonging to the estate, on July 7, 1930, the hearing of which was set by the clerk for July 21, 1930. Notices were given as provided by law, and on July 18, 1930, the appellants filed an answer and objections to this petition. On July 21, 1930, the trial judge signed an order granting permission to mortgage the property involved, which order was filed on July 22, 1930. It is from that order that this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] Appellants first contend that they were denied a hearing in the trial court. They did not appear at the time set for the hearing of the petition, and they now contend that, since this matter involved a trial of issues of fact, they were entitled to five days' notice of such trial, and that the court had no jurisdiction on July 21, 1930, to do anything except to set a future date for trial, of which notice must be given them, as provided in section 594 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If this section had any application to such a hearing as we are considering, the fact would still remain that appellants had more than five days' notice of said hearing; the record showing that notice of the same was given them on July 7, 1930. However, we think the section referred to has no particular application to the case before us. The hearing and notice involved in this proceeding are governed by section 1578 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in which it is provided that the court, at the time fixed and appointed by the clerk, or at such other time to which the hearing may be postponed, if satisfactory proof is made that due notice of the hearing has been given, must proceed to hear the petition and any objections that may be filed or presented thereto. The order here appealed from recites that it satisfactorily appeared to the court that due notice had been given in the manner provided by law. Due notice having been thus given, the court had jurisdiction to proceed, which jurisdiction was not affected by the fact that appellants elected not to be present.

[3, 4] It is next urged that no formal hearing was held in the trial court, and that the order appealed from must have been made in chambers. Nothing appears in the record to support this contention. The order in question recites that it was made in open court, that it came on regularly to be heard; and, after reciting that "it further satisfactorily appearing to this court," the order proceeds to set forth facts which justified the making of the mortgage petitioned for. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, it must be presumed that these formal statements of the court are true and correct, and that the facts recited as satisfactorily appearing to the court were made to appear by proper evidence. The objection is made that the order does not affirmatively state that evidence was taken or witnesses sworn, but it is only reasonable to infer that such was the case from the court's statement that certain facts satisfactorily appeared at a hearing held in open court, and the presumption is in favor of the order.

[5, 6] The third point raised by appellants is that an order could not be made permitting property belonging to this estate to be mortgaged, since it appeared from the objections filed by appellants that the administratrix had failed to file an account as required by section 1628 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Had such a fact been true, it would not have affected the validity of this order, since the jurisdiction of the court to make the same was not dependent upon the filing of an account. For any such neglect, other remedies were available to appellants. However, the court found that it was untrue that the administratrix had failed to file such an account, and, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we must assume that such finding is correct.

[7] It is finally urged that the court had no power to make the order appealed from, for the reason that a prior petition to mortgage the same property was then pending, which had never been acted upon by the court. In this regard, the record shows that such a prior petition to mortgage was filed on June 23, 1930, and a hearing on the same was fixed by the clerk for July 7, 1930. No service of notice of the time and place fixed for said hearing appears in the record, although an answer and objection from these same appellants appears, which was filed July 5, 1930. It is apparent that this first proceeding was abandoned because proper notice had not been given. In any event, the fact that such a prior petition to mortgage was filed and never acted upon does not affect the jurisdiction of the court to proceed to hear a subsequent petition, which was properly noticed and regularly brought on for hearing.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In the Matter of the Estate of Guy B. CHANDLER, Deceased. Ira J. CHANDLER and Harriet M. Chandler, Appellants, v. Christina CHANDLER, Individually and as Administratrix of the Estate of Guy B. Chandler, Deceased, Respondent.

Civ. 559.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District.

March 16, 1931.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Chas. L. Allison, Judge.

See, also, 297 P. 636.

D. Joseph Coyne, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harry Lyons, of Los Angeles, and Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

BARNARD, P. J.

Guy B. Chandler died intestate, and his estate is in the course of administration in the Superior Court of San Bernardino county. The respondent herein is the widow of the deceased and the administratrix of his estate, and the appellants are children of the deceased by a former marriage.

On October 7, 1930, the respondent administratrix filed a petition for permission to execute a deed of trust involving certain property belonging to the estate, and the same was set for hearing by the clerk of the court on October 20, 1930. Notices were given as provided by law, and these appellants filed an answer and objections to said petition on October 17, 1930. The minutes of the court show that on October 20, 1930, the hearing was continued to October 27, 1930. An order granting the petition was made in open court on October 27, 1930, from which this appeal is taken. Apparently the appellants did not appear either on October 20, 1930, or October 27, 1930.

As grounds for reversal, the appellants raise three points: First, that they were denied a hearing in the trial court; second, that no formal hearing was held in the trial court, but that the order appealed from was probably made in chambers; third, that the court had no power to make the order appealed from because the administratrix had failed to file an account as required by section 1628 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

These same three points were raised in another appeal in this same estate, an opinion in which has this day been filed. In re Estate of Chandler (Cal. App.) 297 P. 638. The record on this appeal shows a similar situation and a state of facts similar in every respect, so far as these three points are concerned, to those involved in the other appeal just referred to.

Upon the authority of that decision, and for the reasons therein given, the order here appealed from is affirmed.

WHITTEMORE et ux. v. DAVIS et al.

Civ. 7661.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.
March 20, 1931.

1. Fraud 🔑41.

Complaint alleging fraudulent representations that mortgagee would reconvey property to plaintiffs, if they discontinued action against defaulting purchasers to quiet title, held insufficient.

Defendants demurred to the complaint for failure to allege that plaintiffs had, and effectively pleaded, cause of action to quiet title, whether such action was still pending, or how and to what extent they suffered any detriment or loss or defendants benefited by plaintiff's inaction.

2. Fraud 🔑41.

Complaint alleging fraudulent representations that mortgagee would reconvey property to plaintiffs, if they defaulted in foreclosure proceeding, held insufficient.

Defendants demurred to the complaint for failure to allege whether plaintiffs had meritorious defense to foreclosure proceeding, how or to what extent they suffered any detriment or loss or defendants were benefited by default, or in what respects foreclosure judgment was affected thereby.

3. Fraud 🔑46.

Complaint alleging plaintiffs' execution of quitclaim deed to mortgagee bank in reliance on fraudulent representations that it would reconvey property to plaintiffs held insufficient.

The complaint did not allege that any representative of the bank ever stated that it would immediately reconvey the property to plaintiffs, or that they believed alleged statement that the bank would have to have a quitclaim deed before contract for reconveyance could be finally consummated.

4. Fraud 🔑20.

To recover damages for fraudulent representation, plaintiff must have been so thoroughly induced thereby that, judging from ordinary experience, he would not, in all reasonable probability, have entered into contract otherwise.

5. Pleading 🔑34(4).

Pleading must be construed most strongly against pleader.

6. Pleading 🔑34(4).

When pleading is silent as to material dates, or does not clearly state facts relied on, it must be presumed that statement thereof would weaken pleader's case.

7. Pleading 🔑236(1).

Refusal of leave to file fourth amended complaint after sustaining demurrer to third amended complaint held within court's discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Action by Rex Frank Whittemore and wife against Raymond M. Davis and others. From a judgment on an order sustaining defendants' demurrer to plaintiffs' third amended complaint without leave to amend, plaintiffs appeal.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining defendants' demurrer to plaintiffs' third amended complaint without leave to amend. The complaint is an attempt to state an action sounding in damages for fraud and deceit alleged to have been practiced upon plaintiffs by defendants in a certain loan transaction which is set forth in the complaint. All of the defendants are directors in the defendant American Savings Bank of Pomona, a corporation, and the defendant Davis is manager of the bank. In substance the third amended complaint alleges that on February 2, 1923, plaintiffs executed a note to the bank for $5,000 which was secured by a mortgage on certain property in Los Angeles county; that subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, and prior to the actual payment to the plaintiffs of the sum of $5,000 by defendant American Savings Bank of Pomona, the defendant Raymond M. Davis, acting as the manager and agent and with the sanction and approval of the directors of said defendant corporation, demanded of the plaintiffs the execution of another note for the sum of $3,000, which amount, the defendant Raymond M. Davis stated, was to be a bonus for the execution of said $5,000 loan; that accordingly the plaintiffs did execute a note for $3,000, but that said note was absolutely without consideration; that in September, 1923, plaintiffs sold the property described in the mortgage to one C. E. Jones and wife; that the Joneses defaulted in their payments and plaintiffs filed against them a quiet title action; that an officer of the bank in July, 1925, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs, attached the $3,000 note to the mortgage; that upon the same date the bank filed a foreclosure action against the plaintiffs and the Joneses. Appellants alleged in this action that said foreclosure action was brought by defendant bank through its duly authorized agent, for the purpose of defrauding these plaintiffs, and each of them; that defendant Robinson knew that the $3,000 note was not a part of the original mortgage, and that said defendant Robinson, acting as the duly authorized agent of the bank, intended to defraud and did defraud the plaintiffs out of the value of their property.

Plaintiffs further allege that C. E. Jones and Mary Doe Jones were served with process in the foreclosure action; that subsequent to said service of process on plaintiffs, and before the time for answering had expired, defendant bank, through its agent, defendant Davis, stated to plaintiffs that, if plaintiffs would default in the foreclosure proceeding and would discontinue the prosecution of the quiet title action against C. E. Jones and Mary Doe Jones, defendant bank would resell and reconvey to the plaintiffs the property mortgaged, at whatever price the bank was able to buy it, at the sale of said property in the foreclosure action, upon the following terms and conditions, namely: that if the price paid by the defendant bank for said property were $7500 or less, plaintiffs were to pay defendant bank in cash; if, however, defendant bank was forced to pay more than $7500, plaintiffs were to pay $7500 in cash and the balance by their notes to be due in ninety days and to be secured by a mortgage upon said property; that plaintiffs accepted the foregoing proposition of defendant bank; that the said defendant Davis, continuing to act as the duly authorized agent of the bank, falsely, fraudulently, and knowing the same to be untrue, represented to plaintiffs that no contract in writing was necessary for the purpose of binding said defendant bank to resell and reconvey said mortgaged property, but that the forbearance of plaintiffs to prosecute the quiet title action against C. E. Jones and Mary Doe Jones, together with the further forbearance of plaintiffs to defend the foreclosure action just referred to, would constitute sufficient consideration to bind defendant bank to resell and reconvey the property at whatever price defendant bank might buy it on foreclosure; that said foregoing promises and representations of defendant bank, through its duly authorized agent, Raymond M. Davis, were false, fraudulent, and untrue; that neither the defendant bank nor defendant Raymond M. Davis believed them to be true, and that said promises and representations were made without any intention of performing them, and with intent to defraud the plaintiffs; that plaintiffs believed and relied upon the foregoing false fraudulent representations, and as a direct result of their reliance upon said false and fraudulent statements were defrauded out of the value of their property; that plaintiffs defaulted and ceased to prosecute the quiet title action; that judgment was recovered by the bank in the sum of $9,246.09 in the foreclosure action upon the $8,000; that the property was sold for the sum of $8,328.85 and costs in the sum of $81.91; that a default judgment was entered in the sum of $917.24; that plaintiff demanded that the bank reconvey to plaintiffs and offered the sum of $7,500 in cash and a note payable in ninety days secured by a mortgage for $828.85; that on or about the 20th day of October, 1925, at the defendant American Savings Bank of Pomona, defendant Robinson, with the knowledge, approbation, and approval of the directors of the bank, falsely, fraudulently, and knowing it to be untrue, stated to plaintiff Rex Frank Whittemore that the contract of conveyance of the property from defendant American Savings Bank to plaintiffs was nearly completed, but that before it could be finally consummated defendant bank would have to have a quitclaim deed to the property signed by these plaintiffs; that said foregoing statements of defendant bank, through its duly authorized agent, were false, fraudulent, and untrue; that neither the defendant bank nor defendant F. C. Robinson believed them to be true, and that said statements were made without any intention of performing them, and with intent to defraud plaintiffs; that plaintiffs executed and delivered a quitclaim deed to the bank; that further demands to reconvey were refused and plaintiffs ask damages in the sum of $25,917.24.

[1] A general demurrer was filed; also a special demurrer upon twelve designated grounds. The third amended complaint is indefinite and incomplete in many respects, but we will consider only the points raised that warranted an order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend. Ground 2 of the demurrer reads as follows: "Whether or not a cause of action existed in favor of plaintiffs against C. E. Jones and Mary Doe Jones at the time they filed the quiet title action, or at any time, and/or whether said cause of action was effectively pleaded and/or whether said action is still pending and/or in what manner or to what extent plaintiffs, or either of them, suffered any detriment or loss or defendants gained any benefit by plaintiffs' inaction in said action." The statement in the complaint in reference to the Joneses is immaterial to the issue attempted to be raised unless it could be connected with a continuous scheme or plan on the part of the defendants to defraud. If so, defendants were entitled to know in what manner plaintiffs were deceived and thereby defrauded. Inaction or cessation of prosecuting the quiet title action could not interfere with the orderly proceedings in the foreclosure suit.

[2] In ground 5 the defendants demurred as follows: "Whether at the time plaintiffs did default in the foreclosure proceedings," a valid and meritorious defense thereto existed in favor of plaintiffs, or either of them, or in what manner or to what extent plaintiffs, or either of them, suffered any detriment or loss, or defendants gained any benefit by plaintiffs' default and/or in what respects, if at all, the judgment of foreclosure" "was affected by or was other and different by reason of plaintiffs' alleged default."

There are no allegations in the complaint that the Whittemores were or were not in default under the mortgage. If owners of property are in default in a foreclosure action, and the proper foundation is laid by the mortgagees to bring the action properly alleged, the owners have no defense, and the failure to file an untenable defense could not form consideration for a contract. If the Whittemores had a defense, then it should be alleged as a means of determining the question of consideration for the alleged contract to forbear from appearing and defending. In appellants' brief there is no contention presented that any defense could have been made to the foreclosure suit in so far as the $5,000 note is concerned, but that the $3,000 note was given without consideration and that that allegation is sufficient consideration for the contract not to defend in the foreclosure suit. The allegations in reference to the $3,000 note are uncertain and ambiguous. The terms of the mortgage are not set out, and no reference is made which would indicate whether or not this mortgage did not also secure the $3,000 note. These omissions were important because appellants' alleged contract to forbear to plead is relied upon as part consideration for an alleged subsequent agreement with the bank.

[3, 4] Defendants also demurred to the portion of the complaint alleging the execution and delivery of the quitclaim deed. The complaint does in effect state that the plaintiffs relied upon promises and representations that the bank would immediately give to plaintiffs a contract of conveyance of the property, but it does not appear in the complaint that any representative of the bank ever made a statement that the bank would immediately give to appellants a reconveyance. It does appear that the "bank would have to have a quitclaim deed," but it does not appear that appellants believed such alleged statement. "Unless an untrue statement is believed and acted upon, it can occasion no legal injury. It is essential, therefore, that the party addressed should trust the representation, and be so thoroughly induced by it, that, judging from the ordinary experience of mankind, in the absence of it he would not, in all reasonable probability, have entered into the contract or other transaction." Spinks v. Clark, 147 Cal. 439, 444, 82 P. 45, 47.

[5, 6] The demurrer raises many other objections of incompleteness of allegation and lack of dates. It is unnecessary to discuss the other points presented except to say that upon special demurrer most of the objections should be sustained. A pleading must be construed most strongly against the pleader (Du Bois v. Padgham, 18 Cal. App. 301, 123 P. 207) and, so construed, the complaint fails to state a cause of action. If the allegations in a pleading are silent as to dates, and it appears that such dates are material to the issue, it must be presumed that a statement of such dates would have weakened the pleader's case. The same rule applies when the pleader fails to make a clear specific statement of the facts relied upon. Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 100, 27 P. 29. Paragraph 171, page 274, of volume 1 of Perry on Trusts and Trustees (7th Ed.), relied upon by appellants, is not applicable to this case. The authorities cited do not support the form of action appellants elected to pursue.

[7] In Stewart v. Douglass, 148 Cal. 512, 83 P. 699, the trial judge sustained a demurrer to the fourth amended complaint, and the Supreme Court held: "It was not error for the court to refuse to allow further amendments to the complaint. When a demurrer is sustained to a complaint, it is within the discretion of the court either to allow an amended complaint to be filed, or to give judgment forthwith in favor of the defendant. The appellate court will in every such case sustain the action of the court below, whatever course it may take, unless it is made to appear by the record that there has been an abuse of discretion." A plaintiff may not, without limit, replead after demurrer sustained. In this case another amended complaint would have been a fourth attempt to state a cause of action. The trial court was well within its discretion when it determined that, if appellants could not present a cause of action in the third attempt, the limit had been reached.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ROGERS.

Cr. 2034.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.
March 24, 1931.

1. Criminal law ⇨570(1).

In prosecution for grand theft, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding of jury denying plea of not guilty by reason of insanity.

2. Criminal law ⇨354.

Evidence on issue of insanity showing circumstances under which prosecuting witness' purse was taken, and defendant's appearance and statements at time, was admissible.

> On trial on the plea of insanity, the complaining witness testified that he was jostled while walking down an aisle and that instantly he felt his pocketbook go and grabbed the hand that took it, just as it was being passed to a third party. He further testified that defendant was the man who picked his pocket; that he was clean shaven, and that his hair was cut, presenting an entirely different appearance from that which he exhibited in court; and that when he saw the pocketbook being taken by the third party he said, "That is my property," to which the third party replied, "That is all right, this is a detective."

3. Criminal law ⇨773(2).

Jury should be informed as to nature and character of defendant's acts in determining plea of insanity in criminal prosecution.

4. Criminal law ⇨773(2).

Instruction that generally burden of proof was upon prosecution, but that burden of proving existence of insanity was on defendant, held not erroneous.

5. Criminal law ⇨570(2).

Defendant in criminal prosecution must establish insanity by preponderance of evidence.

Orbison & Irwin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

The defendant was charged with grand theft by an information filed by the district attorney. He interposed two pleas, the one not guilty and the other not guilty by reason of insanity. This appeal is from the judgment pronounced upon the verdicts and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, but in fact only involves the trial upon the second plea of not guilty by reason of insanity.

[1] Without raising a point, but just upon general principles, counsel for appellant first take a few scattering shots at what they term "the anomalous procedure" and then argue as their first reason for a reversal of the judgment that the testimony is insufficient to support the verdict. All that we need to do is to refer to the testimony which supports the jury's finding. Dr. E. H. Steele, one of the physicians appointed by the court, testified that he had made a special study of nervous and mental diseases; that he had made a mental and physical examination of the defendant; that he "observed him both in the jail, ward 110 of the County Hospital, and in the Psychopathic Ward of the County Hospital." This witness further testified as follows: "I observed his conduct and took into consideration his conduct as well as his answers to questions, and he claimed to have no recollection of the charge for which he was arrested, and could give a very poor history of his past. It was so poor, in fact, that it made me believe that he was trying to avoid giving information about himself. It was found that he had a positive Wasserman of the blood, but he had no physical signs showing that he had syphilis of the nervous system." He also testified that in his opinion the defendant knew the difference between right and wrong and was "not legally insane." Dr. Charles L. Allen, who it was stipulated had been connected with the lunacy commission of Los Angeles county for several years, also testified that he had made an examination of the defendant's "nervous functions, and questioned him"; that he "found nothing at the time of" his "examination that would indicate that he was unable to appreciate the nature and quality of his acts"; that he could distinguish right from wrong and was legally sane. This witness also said that the defendant was "uneducated * * * a man of very inferior intelligence," but that he formed "the opinion that he was simulating insanity, because what he told me sounded so foolish and not in keeping with what a person who is really hallucinating will tell you; more like something a child will tell you when he wanted to make up something." Again, the doctor said: "He has an intelligence equal to, or greater than that of a child of 12 years." Another physician attached to the staff of the Norwalk State Hospital, who according to the testimony had made a special study of mental diseases, testified that he had examined the appellant; that in his opinion the defendant was not insane; and that he could understand the difference between right and wrong. When asked why he formed that opinion, the doctor replied: "I formed that opinion because I find in the man no evidence of mental disease. I find him able to appreciate the nature and qualities of his acts, weigh the consequences of his acts; I find no evidence, in other words, of mental disease. This man was able to give me a history of his life. He knew where he was. His memory was unimpaired. He was alert, active, had a correct knowledge of his environments; presented nothing which could be construed as delusions of a typical character or any ideas which sometimes motivate the acts of insane people. There was none of that brought forth. Physical examination of the defendant presented no manifestation of disease. For these reasons, I was led to the conclusion that he was not insane." In addition, the gentleman from whose pocket the purse was taken testified that he was jostled while walking down an aisle in the Grand Central Market and that instantly he felt his pocketbook go and grabbed the hand that took it just as it was being passed to a third party; that the defendant was the man who picked his pocket; that he was clean shaven and his hair was cut. presenting an entirely different appearance from that which he exhibited in court. He further testified that as he saw the pocketbook being taken by the third party the witness said, "That is my property," to which the third party replied: "That is all right, this is a detective." An officer, who was the detective mentioned, testified to the same effect. It is unnecessary for us to comment at length upon this testimony. It cannot be seriously contended that it furnishes an insufficient foundation for the conclusion of the jury even though the evidence opposed to it would have justified a contrary verdict.

[2, 3] It is next asserted that the trial court committed error when it permitted the witness Brown, whose testimony is substantially stated in the résumé already set forth to the effect that the defendant took his pocketbook, etc., to which statement should be added the fact that the witness had never seen the man before and formed no opinion of his sanity or insanity, to testify. Complaint is also made of the testimony of the police officer which was as we noted to the same effect. They say, and properly so, that the sole issue before the court was the sanity of the defendant at the time the acts complained of were committed. But they insist that, "the attempt and purpose was to place full evidence of the offense before the jury—for its prejudicial effect was known by the prosecution." Let us note, first, that the judge at the very beginning of the trial informed the jury that the sole issue was whether the defendant was sane or insane, and, second, that in his final instructions he was particularly careful to emphasize the same thing. It is difficult to believe, therefore, that the jury could possibly have misunderstood their duty in this particular. Now let us assume a different case, one that is hideous and repulsive in its nature and the manner of its commission. Would not such evidence go a long way toward establishing the insanity of the accused? Or we may assume another situation where the crime is planned and carried out with a methodical niceness, evidencing extreme care to prevent detection, could it be seriously contended that such evidence was not pertinent to the inquiry of whether the accused was sane. So here, the testimony of jostling and the testimony concerning defendant's appearance and what was said and left unsaid at the immediate time are all proper to aid the jury in determining whether he was sane at the particular time he was engaged in performing the acts. It may not have been of great probative value, but it was admissible. The reasoning in People v. Linton, 102 Cal. App. 608, 283 P. 389, 392, is in point. There the objection was that the trial court read the information to the jury trying the issue of insanity. The District Court of Appeal said: "Obviously, however, the very purpose of the insanity trial was to ascertain whether appellant had reasoning capacity sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular acts he was charged with having committed * * * and manifestly the jury could not intelligently determine that question without being first informed as to the nature and character of such acts."

[4, 5] There is a further assignment of error to the effect that the trial judge misinstructed the jury. He told them that while generally the burden of proof is upon the prosecution, yet it was subject to this exception that, "Where insanity is relied upon as a defense, the burden of proving the existence of such insanity is on defendant, and it is incumbent upon him to establish, by preponderance of evidence, that he was insane at the time of committing the act charged." It is true, of course, as counsel argue, that the burden of proof does not shift, but it is equally true that the defendant when relying upon the plea of insanity must establish that fact by a preponderance of the evidence. Regardless of whether it is ever necessary to instruct jurors in the technical art to the degree here suggested it is patent that in the particular case appellant is grasping at the shadow and not the substance. As heretofore stated, the sole issue in the trial was the sanity of the defendant and it was sufficient to explain to them that the burden of proving insanity by a preponderance of the evidence rested upon the defendant. Where the burden of proof rested generally was a nonessential.

Judgment and order affirmed.

EDGAR v. CITRARO et al.

Civ. 6865.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 27, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1931.

1. Trial 🔑253(7), 296(7).

"Formula instruction," directing verdict if jury finds certain facts, must embrace all elements essential to recovery; omitting any element being error not cured by inclusion in other instructions.

2. Trial 🔑296(3).

In action by automobile guest for injuries, instruction requiring finding on contributory negligence held not "formula" instruction, and, though omitting element of proximate cause covered by other instructions, held not to warrant reversal.

Instruction that one of defendants was admittedly negligent, and that, before liability can attach, jury must determine whether plaintiff's guest was contributorily negligent, did not in terms direct verdict, and record disclosed that court gave seven other instructions fully covering doctrine of proximate cause. Hence it was clear instruction was not intended as "formula" instruction, and, in view of all instructions, it was unlikely jury accepted instruction as "formula" instruction or was misled by omission of element of proximate cause from single instruction. Therefore, omission did not warrant reversal.

3. Automobiles 🔑246(54).

In action by automobile guest, instruction other driver was admittedly negligent held justified by testimony (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113).

Evidence showed beyond question that driver involved in collision entered and was traversing intersection at speed greater than fifteen miles an hour, though St. 1923, p. 553, § 113, makes it unlawful to traverse an intersection with driver's view obstructed at speed greater than 15 miles per hour. Furthermore, according to other automobile driver's own admissions, after seeing car enter intersection, he failed to stop or bring own automobile under control within distance of 50 feet which he admittedly could have done, and under his testimony it followed necessarily that from intersecting line to point of collision, a distance of 20 feet within intersection, his speed must have been in excess of 15 miles per hour.

4. Automobiles 🔑168(6).

Court held justified in holding motorists traversing intersection with obstructed view at greater than statutory speed negligent as matter of law (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113(b) 2).

5. Automobiles 🔑168(2).

Statute held to mean vehicle's speed, though within maximum limit, is unlawful, if greater than reasonable and proper under circumstances (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113(a) and (b) 2).

Qualifying clause "subject to the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section," as employed at beginning of subdivision (b) of St. 1923, p. 553, § 113, means simply that, even though vehicle is driven within maximum speed fixed by subdivision (b), it is nevertheless unlawful speed if greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to traffic, surface, and width, of highway, or is such as to endanger life, limb, or property of any person.

6. Automobiles 🔑168(2).

Statute declaring violation of speed limit, only prima facie evidence of violation of section, held controlling only in criminal proceeding (St. 1923, p. 554, § 113 (c).

7. Automobiles 🔑242(1).

Evidence justifying holding motorist negligent as matter of law, he was not entitled to presumption of operation in lawful manner.

8. Trial 🔑260(3).

Instruction on presumption of obeying law was properly refused because covered in other instructions.

9. Trial 🔑295(1).

Where instruction, read in entirety, was correct, and court gave additional instruction proposed by defendant on same subject, there was no error.

10. Trial 🔑260(1).

Where refused instruction embodied principles not involved in case, and pertinent principles were covered in given instructions, there was no error.

11. Automobiles 🔑6.

Statute taking away guest's right of action to recover for driver's ordinary negligence does not affect causes of action existing when section became effective (St. 1929, p. 1580, § 141¾).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Florence Edgar, a minor, by John F. Edgar, her guardian ad litem, against Frank Citraro and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, named defendant appeals.

PER CURIAM.

Two automobiles driven respectively by the defendants Frank Citraro and C. D. Pratt collided at the intersection of Julian and Fifth streets in San Jose about 8 o'clock in the evening. Riding with Citraro at the time were Mrs. Rose Edgar, her minor children Florence and John, and her sister, Mrs. Frances P. Traylen, all of whom were more or less injured. Five actions for damages grew out of the accident. Four were instituted by the injured parties, and the fifth by the parents of Florence Edgar to recover the damages they claimed to have sustained on account of the injuries to their daughter. In all of them Citraro and Pratt were joined as parties defendant; it being charged that the accident resulted from their concurrent negligence.

The actions brought by Florence Edgar and Mrs. Traylen were tried separately before juries, and verdicts were rendered against both defendants. The action brought by Edgar and his wife for damages resulting to them on account of the injuries to their daughter Florence, and the one brought by the boy in his own behalf, were tried together before a jury, and a verdict against both defendants was awarded in favor of Edgar and his wife, but it does not appear from the record before us what disposition was made of the boy's action. The fifth action, wherein Edgar and his wife sought to recover damages for the personal injuries she sustained, was tried before the court, sitting without a jury, and the court also found against both defendants. Citraro and Pratt took separate appeals from each judgment. Consequently there are eight appeals; each being presented on a separate record. Nos. 6865, 6866, 6867, 6868, 6905, 6916, 7069, 7070, 297 P. 649, 651, 652, 652, 652, 653, 654. In all of the trials the evidence relating to the cause of the accident was substantially the same. Whatever difference there is will be noted in the opinions filed in the other cases. In the appeals from the judgments obtained in the jury trials the assignments of error relate to the giving, and the refusal to give, certain instructions; and in the remaining appeal the main point urged is that the court erred in denying defendants' applications to file amended answers.

Citraro was driving westerly along Julian street, which is 40 feet wide between curbs, and Pratt was driving southerly along Fifth street, which between curbs is 60 feet wide. The view of the intersection was admittedly obstructed, as that term is defined by section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553), and consequently, under the provisions of said section, it was unlawful to traverse the same at a speed greater than 15 miles an hour. Citraro entered the intersection first, and had nearly reached the other side when the machines collided, the front end of Pratt's car striking Citraro's near the right rear end, immediately following which Citraro's car overturned twice. Pratt admits that, when he was still 30 feet north of the intersection, traveling at a speed of 25 to 30 miles an hour, he saw Citraro enter the intersection, and that, by applying the brakes of his car with full force, he could have brought it to a standstill within a distance of 35 feet; but that he did not so apply them until he reached the intersecting line of Julian street. He was then only 20 feet distant from the pathway of the on-coming Citraro machine, too close to avert a collision therewith. Citraro admits, too, that he was traveling across the intersection at a speed in excess of 15 miles an hour, and that, when he entered the intersection, he looked up Fifth street and saw the approach of the Pratt car, traveling, as he claims, at a speed of about 45 miles an hour, but that he "kept going right across Fifth street, picking up speed a little until the collision." None of the parties riding with Citraro were aware of the presence of the Pratt car until the cars collided. The impact occurred within the intersection 20 feet south of the intersecting line of Julian street, and within 5 feet of the westerly curb line of Fifth street.

[1, 2] In the present action, wherein Florence Edgar was awarded damages for the injuries she received, one of the numerous instructions given was as follows: "Under the evidence in this case, the defendant C. D. Pratt is admittedly guilty of negligence, and the questions, therefore, which you are to determine before liability can attach to the defendants are whether or not the plaintiff Florence Edgar was guilty of contributory negligence." Both appellants contend that the instruction is erroneous, in that it omits the element of proximate cause. It is doubtless the rule that, where a so-called "formula" instruction is given, directing a verdict in the event the jury finds certain facts to be true, it must embrace all the elements essential to a recovery, and that the omission therefrom of any of such elements amounts to error, the prejudicial effect of which is not overcome by the inclusion of the omitted elements in other instructions. (Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599). But, as will be noted, the foregoing instruction does not in terms direct a verdict, and the record discloses that the court gave no less than seven other instructions wherein the doctrine of proximate cause was fully and completely covered (see instructions VIII, X, XII, XIII, XIV, XIX, and XX, as set forth in transcript No. 6865). It is apparent, therefore, that the instruction complained of was not intended by the court as a "formula" instruction, and, when all the instructions are read and considered together, it seems wholly unlikely that the jury accepted it as such or was misled by the omission of the element of proximate cause from this single instruction. The situation falls, therefore, within the rule applied in the case of Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390, 264 P. 237, and does not warrant a reversal. See, also, Robinet v. Hawks, 200 Cal. 265, 252 P. 1045; Towne v. Godeau, 70 Cal. App. 148, 232 P. 1010.

[3] The defendant Pratt makes the separate contention that the court erred in stating to the jury that he was admittedly guilty of negligence, claiming that the nature of his testimony was such as to raise a conflict on that point. This contention cannot be maintained, however, in the face of the evidence showing beyond question that he entered and was traversing the intersection at a speed greater than 15 miles an hour; and, furthermore, according to his own admissions, after seeing Citraro enter the intersection, and without the slightest excuse or reason, he failed to bring his car to a stop, or even under control, within a distance of 50 feet, which he admits he easily could have done; and, even though, as he claims, after seeing Citraro enter the intersection, he "gradually slowed down" from 25 or 30 miles an hour to a speed of not more than 15 miles an hour at the point of collision, it follows necessarily that from the intersecting line to the point of the collision, a distance of 20 feet within the intersection, his speed must have been in excess of 15 miles an hour. The cases the defendant Pratt relies upon in furtherance of his theory as to the latter point are not pertinent here, because they involve the construction of the provisions of the previous Vehicle Act of 1913, fixing a speed limit of ten miles an hour "on approaching" an intersection where the driver's view was obstructed, which is essentially different from the provisions of the Vehicle Act of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 517) in force at the time this accident happened, which fixes a speed limit of 15 miles an hour "in traversing" an intersection, etc.

[4] The court also instructed the jury that, if it found that Citraro and Pratt were traversing said intersection at a speed in excess of 15 miles an hour, they were guilty of negligence "as a matter of law," and, if it further found that such negligence was the proximate cause of the accident, and that plaintiff herself was free from contributory negligence, plaintiff was entitled to a verdict. Both defendants contend that under the provisions of section 113 of the Vehicle Act of 1923, which, as stated, was in force at the time this accident took place, it was not negligence "as a matter of law" to traverse an intersection at a speed greater than 15 miles an hour, but was only prima facie evidence of negligence, and that consequently the instruction was erroneous. We find no merit in the contention. Subdivision (b) 2 of said section 113 declares that "subject to the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section and except in those instances where a lower speed is specified in this act, it shall be lawful for the driver of a vehicle to drive the same at a speed not exceeding * * * fifteen miles an hour in traversing an intersection of highways when the driver's view is obstructed. * * *" And it has been held in the case of Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 277 P. 1045, in quoting approvingly from an earlier case (Scragg v. Sallee, 24 Cal. App. 133, 144, 140 P. 706, 710), that it is "strictly correct" to instruct a jury that the act of driving a vehicle over a street or public highway beyond the statutory speed limit is "of itself negligence," or "negligence as a matter of law," or "negligence per se." The more recent case of Loggie v. Interstate Transit Co. (Cal. App.) 291 P. 618, holds to the same effect.

[5, 6] Aside from what is said in those cases, we think it evident from an analysis of the different provisions of said section 113, first, that the qualifying clause, "subject to the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section," as employed at the beginning of subdivision (b), means simply that, even though a vehicle is driven within the maximum speed fixed by subdivision (b) of said section, it is nevertheless an unlawful speed if it is greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic, surface, and width of the highway, or is such as to endanger the life, limb, or property of any person. Subd. (c) section 113. Such was the construction given to the provisions of the previous Vehicle Act (Cook v. Miller, 175 Cal. 497, 166 P. 316; Garns v. Halpern, 193 Cal. 193, 223 P. 545), and the same construction has been placed on the act of 1923 (Truitner v. Knight, 83 Cal. App. 655, 257 P. 447; Davis v. Brown, 92 Cal. App. 20, 267 P. 754; City of Sacramento v. Hunger, 79 Cal. App. 234, 249 P. 223. And, secondly, when the provisions of subdivision (c) of said section 113, which purport to declare the legal status of evidence establishing violations of the speed restrictions fixed by said section, are read along with the provisions of sections 153 and 154 of said act, relating to the arrest of the violators and the institution against them of criminal proceedings, it is clear that the provisions of said subdivision (c) of said section 113 were intended to be controlling only in criminal proceedings. Moreover, our attention has been called to no case, nor have we been able to find any, holding that a complaint in a civil action for negligence, based upon a violation of the statutory speed restrictions fixed by subdivision (b) of section 113 of the Vehicle Act, "shall specify" as provided in subdivision (c) thereof "approximately the speed at which the defendant is alleged to have driven and exactly the lawful speed at the time and place of the alleged offense." And manifestly, to adopt defendants' contentions in this regard would be to establish in negligence cases involving violations of the speed restrictions of the Vehicle Act a standard of proof entirely different from the one heretofore governing such cases, and wholly contrary to the one prevailing in cases of negligence based upon all other statutory violations. We are not prepared to hold that such was the intention of the Legislature in enacting subdivision (c) of said section 113.

[7] The defendant Pratt complains also of the refusal to instruct the jury in his behalf that it is presumed that every man obeys the law, and that consequently in the present case it must be presumed that he was at all times operating his automobile "at the legal speed limit" and in a careful and prudent manner. As already pointed out, however, the evidence was legally sufficient to justify the trial court in holding that he was guilty of negligence as a matter of law; and the jury was so instructed. That being so, he was not entitled to the benefit of the presumption that he was at all times operating his automobile in a lawful manner.

[8, 9] The defendant Citraro assigns as error the giving, and refusal to give, a number of other instructions, but we find no merit in any of his objections. Instruction No. XLII, proposed by him, embodying the legal principle that it is presumed that every man obeys the law, was properly refused, because the subject-matter thereof was fully covered in instruction No. XXVI which the court gave. The main portion of instruction No. VI relating to the doctrine of contributory negligence as given by the court is not included in the quotation in defendant's brief, and, upon examining the instruction, it will be found that the entire instruction as given conforms to the law as laid down in the case of Dowd v. Atlas Taxi. Co., 187 Cal. 523, 202 P. 870. See, also, Curran v. Earle C. Anthony Co., 77 Cal. App. 462, 247 P. 236. Moreover the court gave three additional instructions proposed by defendant on the same subject.

[10] Whatever defects there may have been in instruction XX relating to the right of way at intersections was cured by six other instructions upon the same subject which were given at the request of Citraro. (See instructions XXX to XXXV, inclusive.) Instructions Nos. XL and XLI which the court refused to give embodied certain principles not involved in this case, and the pertinent principles therein contained were covered in instructions XXXIII and XXV which the court gave.

[11] The accident happened and the judgments were obtained prior to the enactment of section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1929, p. 1580), which took away the right of action of a guest in a vehicle to recover for personal injuries based on ordinary negligence of the driver, and defendant Citraro contends on all of the appeals that the provisions of said section are to be given a retrospective operation, in which case the judgments obtained against him would be nullified, because admittedly the injured parties were riding as his guests at the time of the accident, and there is no claim made that he was either intoxicated or guilty of gross negligence. The question presented has been decided adversely to defendant's contention by the recent case of Callet v. Alioto (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 438, which holds that the provisions of said section are to be given prospective operation, and consequently do not affect causes of action existing at the time said section became effective.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

TRAYLEN v. CITRARO et al.

Civ. 6866.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 27, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1931.

1. Automobiles ⚿244(20, 35).

In action by guest against motorists colliding in intersection with obstructed view, while traveling above statutory speed, evidence justified conclusion motorists were negligent as matter of law (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113 (b) 2).

2. Trial ⚿296(3).

In guest's personal injury action against motorists, omission of element of proximate cause in other than "formula" instruction held not prejudicial, where covered in other instruction.

3. Negligence ⚿136(25).

Question of proximate cause becomes one of law, where facts are uncontroverted, permitting of only one inference.

4. Automobiles ⚿201(8), 245(64), 246(57).

In action by guest, it appearing collision would not have occurred but for violation of statutory speed limit by both drivers, accident was result of concurrent negligence, making issue of proximate cause question of law, justifying refusal of instruction thereon.

5. Automobiles ⚿246(57).

Undisputed evidence, in action by guest against motorists, showing collision was caused by concurrent negligence of both drivers, refusing instruction one driver's negligence was sole proximate cause of accident held not error.

6. Automobiles ⚿246(60).

Motorist, being negligent as matter of law, was not entitled to instruction on presumption of obeying law.

PER CURIAM.

This is the second of five actions arising out of a collision which took place at the intersection of Fifth and Julian streets in San Jose, between two automobiles driven respectively by the defendants Pratt and Citraro. In four of them judgments were obtained by the plaintiffs therein and the defendants took separate appeals. The result of the fifth action does not appear. In the present action Mrs. Traylen, who was one of the passengers riding in the Citraro machine at the time of the accident, obtained a verdict for damages against both defendants for the personal injuries she received as a result of the collision. The judgment in one of the other actions has this day been affirmed (Florence Edgar, a Minor, etc., v. Citraro et al. [Cal. App.] 297 P. 645, 651), and, except as hereinafter noted, the evidence in the present case as to the manner in which the accident happened is substantially the same as in that case, and the essential facts are set forth in the opinion therein. Most of the points urged for a reversal of the judgment in the present action also are disposed of in the opinion in that case, and consequently it will be unnecessary to consider the same here.

The state of the record in the present case differs from the one in that case, however, in this: There the court instructed that Pratt was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, but left the question of Citraro's negligence for the jury to determine; whereas, here the jury was instructed that both defendants were guilty of negligence as a matter of law. The instruction read as follows: "I instruct you that under the evidence in this case that the defendants are, and each of them is, as a matter of law guilty of negligence and the question which you are to determine before liability can attach to defendants, and before any question of damage should be considered by you, is whether or not the plaintiff Frances P. Traylen, was guilty of contributory negligence."

⚿For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

[1] The evidence is legally sufficient to sustain the trial court's conclusion that both defendants were guilty of negligence as a matter of law. In addition to the testimony given in the Florence Edgar Case, Pratt admitted here that, when he crossed the intersecting curb line of Julian street into the intersection, he was traveling 20 miles an hour, which clearly established a violation of the statutory speed restriction (subd. (b) 2, § 113, California Vehicle Act [St. 1923, p. 553]); and Citraro did not take the witness stand at all in the present case, and the testimony given by others was to the effect that he was traveling across the intersection at a speed greater than 15 miles an hour, and therefore in violation of the provisions of the Vehicle Act above cited.

[2] Both appellants contend here, as in the Florence Edgar Case, that the form of the instruction given was erroneous, in that it omitted the element of proximate cause; but, as pointed out in our opinion in that case, the form of the instruction does not bring it within the classification of a so-called "formula" instruction, and consequently, if the element of proximate cause was covered by any other instruction, a reversal is not warranted. Such an instruction was given in the present case at the request of the defendant Pratt. It was as follows: "Plaintiff having alleged that she has been damaged by the careless and negligent act of the defendants as set forth in her complaint, the burden of proving affirmatively by a preponderance of the evidence every fact and circumstance necessary to make out her case is cast upon her; the law presumes nothing against the defendants or either of them; the law casts upon the plaintiff the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was injured and damaged through the careless and negligent act of the defendants or either of them as alleged in her complaint and that such careless and negligent act on the part of the defendants was the proximate cause of such injury and damage as is alleged in the complaint, otherwise you must render a verdict for the defendants." (Italics ours.) It is evident, therefore, that the omission to include the element of proximate cause in the instruction complained of was not prejudicial. Wirthman v. Isenstein, 182 Cal. 108, 187 P. 12; Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390, 264 P. 237; Robinet v. Hawks, 200 Cal. 265, 252 P. 1045; Towne v. Godeau, 70 Cal. App. 148, 232 P. 1010.

[3, 4] Furthermore, it is well settled that the question of proximate cause, like those of negligence and contributory negligence, becomes one of law where the facts are uncontroverted and only one deduction or inference is deducible therefrom. 20 R. C. L. p. 148; 45 Cor. Jur. pp. 1320, 1322. And in the present case it would appear as a mathematical certainty that, if either defendant had been traveling across the intersection within the statutory speed limit, or had slackened his speed after having seen the approach of the other, the two machines would not have reached the same point at the same time, and consequently there would have been no collision. In other words, it was a clear case of concurrent negligence wherein the evidence shows beyond any reasonable inference to the contrary that the negligence of each defendant contributed proximately to the happening of the accident. In this regard the case is the same in principle as Cook v. Miller, 175 Cal. 497, 166 P. 316, 317, and Berges v. Guthrie, 51 Cal. App. 547, 197 P. 356, 357, which holds that where, as here, a collision occurs between two automobiles while the respective drivers thereof are violating the statutory traffic regulations, and would not have occurred had either of them observed the provisions of the statute, the accident is the result of their concurrent negligence, and the negligence of each is the proximate cause thereof. In the present case, therefore, the issue of proximate cause was one of law, and the trial court would have been justified in refusing to give any instructions on that subject.

[5] For the same reason the trial court did not err in refusing to give certain instructions proposed by Citraro based on his theory of the case that the "intervening, independent negligence" of Pratt was the sole proximate cause of the accident. In this regard Citraro's position is the same as if he were suing Pratt for damages, and Pratt were urging the defense of contributory negligence, for in such a case Citraro admittedly would not be entitled to a verdict in his favor if the uncontroverted evidence were sufficient to justify the court in holding as a matter of law that his negligence contributed proximately to the happening of the accident. Such was the situation in Cook v. Miller, supra, and the court therein said: "If he [the plaintiff] had not passed to the right of the wagon he would not have struck the automobile. So, also, if the defendant had turned the corner by going to the right of the intersection, his automobile would not have been struck by the motorcycle. The disobedience of the ordinance by both of them brought on this accident. It was the result of their concurrent negligence, the negligence of each was the proximate cause, and each contributed to the injury." Also in Berges v. Guthrie, supra, wherein the judgment in favor of plaintiff was reversed upon the ground that he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, the court said: "* * * If the defendant had not recklessly emerged from behind the street car without waiting to see whether an automobile was approaching from his right, which would have the right of way, he would not have struck the plaintiff. On the other hand, if the plaintiff had slackened his speed upon approaching the crossing, where his view of the road traffic was obstructed by the street car and automobile following it, defendant would have cleared the street before plaintiff reached the point of collision, or plaintiff would have had time and space to turn safely to his right into Twenty-Third street, and thus have avoided the accident when he saw the danger impending. It appears, therefore, that the situation here is closely analogous to the facts in the case of Cook v. Miller, supra, and that the disobedience of the ordinance by both plaintiff and defendant brought about the accident; the negligence of each being a proximate cause. Under such circumstances the plaintiff should not recover."

And so in the present case, if Citraro had been traveling across the intersection at the lawful rate of speed of 15 miles an hour, or had reduced his speed to the lawful rate upon seeing the rapid approach of the Pratt machine, he would not have reached the pathway of the Pratt Machine, and consequently would not have been struck thereby; or, if Pratt had been traveling at a lawful rate of speed, or had applied his brakes with full force upon seeing Citraro enter the intersection, he would not have struck the Citraro machine.

[6] The instructions proposed by Citraro to the effect that he was entitled to the presumption that every man obeys the law were properly refused because, as pointed out in our decision in the Florence Edgar Case with respect to similar instructions proposed by Pratt, the evidence established, and the jury was instructed, that Citraro was guilty of negligence as a matter of law. The remaining points urged in furtherance of these appeals are answered and disposed of adversely to defendants' contentions in the Florence Edgar Case.

The judgment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

A judgment for damages after verdict by a jury was entered against the defendants in the above-entitled action and separate appeals were taken therefrom, which have been presented on separate records. The appeal taken by the defendant Citraro has been this day determined adversely to his contentions (Florence Edgar, a Minor, etc., v. Citraro et al. [Cal. App.] 297 P. 645), and all of the points urged by the defendant Pratt on the present appeal were considered and disposed of in our decision therein. Therefore, in conformity with the conclusions stated therein, the judgment as to appellant Pratt is also affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

Separate appeals were taken by the defendants Pratt and Citraro from a judgment for damages entered against them, after verdict by a jury, in the above-entitled action; and the appeals are presented on separate records. All of the grounds urged for reversal by both defendants were considered and determined in the adverse decision we have this day filed in the appeal taken by the defendant Citraro. Frances P. Traylen v. Citraro et al., No. 6866, 297 P. 649. Therefore, in accordance with the views therein expressed, the judgment as to the defendant Pratt is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

This appeal, taken by the defendant Pratt from the judgment for damages entered herein against both defendants, after verdict by a jury, is companion to the one taken by the defendant Citraro from the same judgment; the appeals having been presented on separate records. We have this day determined the latter appeal adversely to the contentions of the appellant therein (John F. Edgar et ux. v. Citraro et al., 297 P. 654), and in our decision therein we disposed also of all of the contentions made by the defendant Pratt on the present appeal. Therefore, upon the grounds therein stated, the judgment as to the defendant Pratt is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiffs obtained a judgment for damages against both of the defendants in the above-entitled action, and the latter took separate appeals which are presented on separate records. On the companion appeal, taken by the defendant Citraro, which we have this day held to be without merit (John F. Edgar et ux. v. Citraro et al., 297 P. 645), we considered also and determined adversely all questions raised by the defendant Pratt on the present appeal. The judgment as to the defendant Pratt is therefore affirmed.

1. Action 🔑50(3).

Collision gave rise to separate cause of action in favor of each injured guest.

2. Action 🔑50(3).

Injuries in same automobile collision to mother and minor daughter who were guests gave rise to three distinct causes of action.

> One cause of action arose in favor of husband and wife for personal injuries to wife; another in favor of minor daughter for injuries she sustained; and third and distinct cause of action in favor of husband and wife, as parents of minor daughter, to recover indemnity for financial loss they sustained on account of injuries to daughter.

3. Action 🔑50(3).
Pleading 🔑52(2).

Spouses could unite separate causes of action, for injuries to wife and financial loss from injuries to minor daughter arising out of same accident, in one complaint, if separately stated, or bring separate suits, subject to right of court to consolidate (Code Civ. Proc. § 427).

PER CURIAM.

Rose Edgar, one of the plaintiffs above named, and her minor daughter, Florence, were riding in an automobile driven by the defendant Citraro and were injured when it collided with one driven by the defendant Pratt at the intersection of Fifth and Julian streets in San Jose. The other occupants of the Citraro car were Mrs. Edgar's minor son John, and her sister Mrs. Traylen, who were also injured. Several actions for damages grew out of the collision. Two were filed by the plaintiffs herein. In one of them they sought to be indemnified for the financial loss they suffered by reason of injuries to their daughter Florence, and in the other (the present one) they asked for damages on account of the personal injuries sustained by Mrs. Edgar. The former action was consolidated for trial with one brought by the boy John in his own behalf, and a jury awarded Edgar and his wife a verdict. Judgment being entered accordingly, the defendants took separate appeals, and the judgment has this day been affirmed as to both defendants. John F. Edgar et ux. v. Citraro et al., 297 P. 652, 654. Following the trial of that action, the present one was tried before the court sitting without a jury, and the court found against both defendants. Judgment was entered in conformity with such findings, from which the defendants have taken separate appeals.

[1-3] Prior to the commencement of the trial of this action, defendants presented separate motions for leave to file amended and supplemental answers, so as to plead as a bar to the present action the pendency of the other action and the judgment entered therein. The motions were denied, and the trial court's rulings in that regard furnish the grounds for the present appeals; it being contended that the right of Edgar and his wife to damages on account of the collision constituted but one inseverable cause of action; and that therefore, since they split the same into two demands and brought one action on each, the first action was a bar to the second. Only a few authorities have been cited by respondents in opposition to the foregoing contention, and those which are cited are far from the point, and consequently have not been at all helpful in determining what appears to be a serious question of pleading. However, upon analyzing the arguments made by appellants and the authorities they have cited in support thereof, it will be found, we think, that their contention is based upon a confusion of the meaning of the term "cause of action," and consequently is unsound.

Says the Supreme Court in the case of McKee v. Dodd, 152 Cal. 637, 93 P. 854, 855, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 780, 125 Am. St. Rep. 82: "A cause of action, as Professor Pomeroy points out with his usual lucidity (Remedies and Remedial Rights, § 452 et seq.), arises out of an antecedent primary right and corresponding duty and the delict or breach of such primary right and duty by the person on whom the duty rests. 'Of these elements, the primary right and duty and the delict or wrong combined constitute the cause of action in the legal sense of the term and as it is used in the Codes of the several states.'" In the present case, as shown, the negligent acts of defendants resulted in the injury to several persons. The primary right of each person injured was therefore violated, which gave rise to a separate cause of action in favor of each injured person. One cause of action arose in favor of Edgar and his wife for the personal injuries Mrs. Edgar sustained; another in favor of Florence Edgar for the injuries she sustained; and there was still a third and distinct cause of action which arose out of the injuries to Florence Edgar and in favor of Edgar and his wife, as the parents of Florence, to recover indemnity for the financial loss they sustained on account of the injuries to their daughter. It will be seen, therefore, that, although this latter cause of action in favor of Edgar and his wife had its origin in the same transaction out of which their first cause of action arose, nevertheless it was founded manifestly upon the violation of a different primary right; and, that being so, the two causes of action were distinct, and, under the provisions of section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiff had the option of uniting the two in one complaint, providing the same were separately stated, or of bringing a separate suit on each cause of action (Realty Construction, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 543, 132 P. 1048), subject to the right of the court to consolidate the same for trial.

For the reasons stated, it is our opinion that the trial court did not err in denying leave to amend the answers.

The judgment is affirmed.

EDGAR et ux. v. CITRARO et al.

Civ. 7070.

District Court of Appeal, First District,

Rehearing Denied March 27, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1931.

1. Automobiles 🔑168(6).

Motorists colliding in intersection, with obstructed view, while traveling above statutory speed, held negligent as matter of law (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113 (b) 2).

2. Negligence 🔑136(25).

Question of proximate cause becomes one of law where facts are uncontroverted, permitting of only one inference.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1067.
Automobiles 🔑244(36).

In guest's action against motorists colliding in intersection, with obstructed view, court held warranted in holding each defendant as matter of law guilty of negligence contributing proximately to collision; hence neither defendant could complain of refusal to instruct on such elements (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113 (b) 2).

Evidence showed beyond all reasonable inference to contrary that collision resulted from concurrent negligence of defendant motorists, and that negligence of each proximately contributed thereto; plaintiff guest's own driver admitting that, when he entered intersection, he saw other car approaching at high speed and continued across intersection, and other driver admitting that, when he was still 30 feet from intersection, traveling at excessive speed, he saw other automobile entering intersection, and by applying brakes could have stopped car within 35 feet, but made no effort so to apply brakes until he reached intersection, when he was only 20 feet distant from pathway of car, too close to avert collision.

In action by guest against motorists, issues of negligence and proximate cause being questions of law under evidence, instruction on doctrine of preponderance of evidence held adequate.

Court, in instructing on doctrine of preponderance of evidence and burden of proof, stated that in civil cases preponderance of evidence is required, and by "preponderance of evidence" is meant such evidence, as, when weighed with that opposed to it, has more convincing force, and from which it results that greater probability is in favor of party on whom burden rests. It then gave more elaborate instructions on same doctrine in connection with issues of contributory negligence. Under circumstances, instruction was not erroneous as not adequately informing jury that burden of proving case by preponderance of evidence was on plaintiffs.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiffs, as the parents of Florence Edgar, a minor, brought this action to recover the damages they claimed to have sustained by reason of the injuries their daughter received in a collision between two automobiles driven respectively by the defendants Citraro and Pratt, which occurred at Fifth and Julian streets in San Jose. The action was consolidated for trial with one brought by John Edgar, a minor, against the same parties and arising out of the same collision, and upon trial before a jury the plaintiffs herein were awarded a verdict against both defendants. The result of the case brought by John Edgar, a minor, does not appear from the record. From the judgment entered in favor of these plaintiffs, the defendants have taken separate appeals.

[1-3] At the time of the collision Florence Edgar was one of several occupants of the Citraro machine. The others were her mother, Mrs. Rose Edgar, her aunt, Mrs. Frances P. Traylen, and her brother John, all of whom, including Florence, brought actions for damages. The actions instituted by Florence Edgar and Mrs. Traylen were tried separately and resulted in verdicts in their favor and against both defendants; and separate appeals were taken from the judgments entered therein, which we have this day affirmed. Florence Edgar, a Minor, etc., v. Citraro et al., Nos. 6865 and 6867, 297 P. 645, 651, and Frances P. Traylen v. Citraro et al., Nos. 6866 and 6868, 297 P. 649, 652. The evidence in the present case is substantially the same as that adduced in the Florence Edgar Case, and all of the essential facts as to the manner in which the accident happened are set forth in the opinion filed therein. As there stated, the Citraro car, which was traveling westerly along Julian street, entered the intersection first, and had nearly reached the other side when the Pratt car, which was traveling southerly along Fifth street, entered the intersection and struck the right rear end of the Citraro car, which overturned twice. Both cars were traveling across the intersection at a speed exceeding 15 miles an hour, which was in violation of subdivision (b) 2 of section 113 of the California Vehicle Act of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 553), which was in force at the time of the accident. Consequently, both were guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and the court so instructed the jury; the instruction being as follows: "I instruct you that under the evidence in these cases the defendants are, and each of them is, as a matter of law, guilty of negligence, and the question which you are to determine in each case before liability can attach to the defendants, and before any question of damage should be considered, is the question of contributory negligence. If Florence Edgar was guilty of contributory negligence, her parents, John F. Edgar and Rose Edgar, cannot recover any damages in the action No. 175,550, in which they are plaintiffs." As will be observed, the instruction omits reference to the element of proximate cause, and no other instruction was given upon that subject, although both parties requested that such instructions be given. It is contended, therefore, by both defendants that the failure to give such instructions constituted prejudicial error.

As pointed out in the opinion in the Frances P. Traylen Case, supra, it is well settled that the question of proximate cause, like the questions of negligence and contributory negligence, becomes one of law where the facts are uncontroverted and only one deduction or inference is deducible therefrom. 20 R. C. L. p. 148; 45 Cor. Jur. pp. 1320, 1322. And in the present case the evidence shows beyond all reasonable inference to the contrary that the collision resulted from the concurrent negligence of the defendants, and that the negligence of each proximately contributed thereto. In this regard Pratt admits that, when he was still 30 feet north of the intersection line, traveling at a speed of 25 or 30 miles an hour, he saw the Citraro car enter the intersection, and that, by applying the brakes with full force at that time, he could have stopped his car within a distance of 35 feet, but that he made no effort to so apply his brakes until he reached the intersecting line of Julian street. He was then only 20 feet distant from the pathway of the on-coming Citraro car, too close to avert a collision therewith. On the other hand, Citraro admits that, when he entered the intersection, he looked up Fifth street and saw the approach of the Pratt car, traveling, as he claims, at a speed of 45 miles an hour; nevertheless he admits that he neither applied the brakes nor diverted his course, but "kept going right across Fifth street, picking up speed a little," as he says, until he was struck by the Pratt machine. Under such circumstances, the trial court was justified in concluding as a matter of law that the negligence of each defendant contributed proximately to the happening of the accident, for manifestly, if either had been traveling across the intersection within the statutory speed limit, or had slackened his speed or diverted his course, after seeing the approach of the other, their respective machines would not have reached the same point at the same time, and there would have been no collision.

A similar situation was presented in the cases of Cook v. Miller, 175 Cal. 497, 166 P. 316, 317, and Berges v. Guthrie, 51 Cal. App. 547, 197 P. 356, 357, and in the former case the court said: "If he had not passed to the right of the wagon he would not have struck the automobile. So, also, if the defendant had turned the corner by going to the right of the intersection, his automobile would not have been struck by the motorcycle. The disobedience of the ordinance by both of them brought on this accident. It was the result of their concurrent negligence, the negligence of each was a proximate cause, and each contributed to the injury." In the latter case, the driver of one of the two cars involved in the collision sued the driver of the other for damages, and on appeal the judgment he obtained was reversed upon the ground that the evidence showed that the negligence of both drivers contributed proximately to the happening of the accident. In this regard the court said: "* * * If the defendant had not recklessly emerged from behind the street car without waiting to see whether an automobile was approaching from his right, which would have the right of way, he would not have struck the plaintiff. On the other hand, if the plaintiff had slackened his speed upon approaching the crossing, where his view of the road traffic was obstructed by the street car and automobile following it, defendant would have cleared the street before plaintiff reached the point of collision, or plaintiff would have had time and space to turn safely to his right into Twenty-Third street, and thus have avoided the accident when he saw the danger impending. It appears, therefore, that the situation here is closely analogous to the facts in the case of Cook v. Miller, supra, and that the disobedience of the ordinance by both plaintiff and defendant brought about the accident; the negligence of each being a proximate cause. Under such circumstances the plaintiff should not recover."

We are of the opinion, therefore, that, under the uncontroverted facts of the present case, the court was warranted in holding as a matter of law that the negligence of each defendant contributed proximately to the collision, and that therefore neither defendant is in a position to complain of the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury upon that element.

[4] The court gave the following general instruction upon the doctrine of preponderance of evidence and burden of proof: "In civil cases a preponderance of evidence is required, and by a 'preponderance of evidence' is meant such evidence as, when weighed with that opposed to it, has more convincing force, and from which it results that the greater probability is in favor of the party upon whom the burden rests." It then gave more elaborate instructions upon the same doctrine in connection with the issues of contributory negligence. The defendant Pratt claims that the instruction above quoted was erroneous, in that it did not adequately inform the jury that the burden of proving plaintiffs' case by a preponderance of evidence was upon the plaintiffs. We think that under the circumstances, the instruction was adequate, because, as already shown, under the evidence, the main issues of negligence and proximate cause became questions of law.

Nor are we able to sustain defendant Pratt's complaint regarding instruction IX as given by the court, for the reason that any omission in said instruction was covered by instruction XII relating to the same subject. (See transcript No. 6905.) The remaining points urged by both defendants are discussed and determined in the Florence Edgar and Frances P. Traylen Cases, supra.

In conclusion, it may be stated that, although the evidence was substantially the same in all three of the jury cases the trial court appears to have instructed differently in each case in this regard: In the first case, brought by Florence Edgar, the jury was instructed that Pratt was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and the question of Citraro's negligence was left for the jury to determine. It also gave instructions upon the doctrine of proximate cause. In the second case, brought by Frances P. Traylen, it instructed the jury that both defendants were guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and it also gave certain instructions upon the doctrine of proximate cause. And in the present case it likewise instructed that both defendants were guilty of negligence as a matter of law, but it refused to give any instructions upon the doctrine of proximate cause. Notwithstanding this unusual condition, a reversal is not warranted in any of the cases, in our opinion, for the reason that the evidence in the first two cases would have been legally sufficient also to justify the trial court in holding, as it did in the present case, that both defendants were guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and that the negligence of each contributed proximately to the happening of the accident.

The judgment is affirmed.

WATWOOD v. FOSDICK.

L. A. 10859.

Supreme Court of California.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑162.

In absence of statute, it is landlord's duty to keep in repair stairways or other parts of building used in common by tenants.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑162.

In absence of statute, landlord need not remove structural defects in parts of building used by tenants in common, where defects are visible and known to tenants.

> This is true because tenant takes premises as they are at time of commencement of tenancy.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑162.

Statutes require new stairways in new tenement houses to have handrails, but in old buildings only new stairways need have handrails, though building is remodeled (St. 1917, pp. 1475, 1497, 1498, §§ 5, 45, 49).

> St. 1917, p. 1475, § 5, provides that building not erected for, or not used as, tenement house at passage of act, if thereafter converted to such use, shall become subject to all provisions of act affecting tenement houses thereafter erected. Section 45 provides that every tenement house thereafter erected shall have not less than two stairways, and section 49 provides that every stairway thereafter constructed should have at least one handrail, and, if over five feet in width, shall have handrail on each side.

LANGDON, J.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries. Defendant was the owner of a two-story building containing four flats, two on the first floor and two on the second. There was a single entrance for all tenants and an inside stairway used in common by all tenants. Plaintiff rented a lower floor flat on February 20, 1926. On April 27, 1926, she visited an acquaintance on the upper floor, and in returning slipped on the stairs and fell to the bottom, sustaining various injuries.

The evidence tended to show that she had caught her foot in the worn rubber covering of one of the steps and had stumbled. There was no handrail on the stairway, and plaintiff had been aware of this fact from the beginning of her tenancy. The trial court nevertheless found that the accident would not have happened had there been a handrail, and concluded that the failure to install such a protection constituted negligence which proximately caused the injury. Judgment was therefore rendered for plaintiff, from which judgment the defendant landlord appealed.

[1, 2] It is clear that, in the absence of some special statute, the landlord cannot be held liable under the above facts. It is his duty to keep stairways or other parts of the building used in common by tenants in repair, but he is under no duty to remove structural defects which are visible and known to the tenant. The latter takes the premises as they are at the time of the commencement of the tenancy. Miller v. Hooper, 119 Me. 527, 112 A. 256; Dwyer v. Woollard, 205 App. Div. 546, 199 N. Y. S. 840; 16 R. C. L. 1040; 36 C. J. 215, § 893. The case of Hassell v. Denning, 84 Cal. App. 479, 258 P. 426, relied upon by plaintiff, is not in conflict with these conclusions, for in that case there was a railing which had been permitted by the landlord to fall into disrepair, and its dangerous condition was unknown to the tenant.

[3] At the time of the accident, there were in existence a city ordinance and a state statute requiring buildings of this type to provide handrails for stairways. Both the ordinance and the statute were passed subsequent to the erection of this building, and in both it is expressly provided that they shall not be retroactive. However, the building was reconstructed by defendant upon his purchase of it in 1920, after the passage of the state statute; and by said reconstruction it was changed from a duplex dwelling to a house containing four flats or tenements. The statute (Stats. 1917, c. 738) provides in section 5 thereof: "A building not erected for, or which is not used as a tenement house at the time of the passage of this act, if hereafter converted to or altered for such use, shall thereupon become subject to all of the provisions of this act affecting tenement houses hereafter erected." Section 45 provides: "Every tenement house hereafter erected * * * shall have not less than two * * * stairways. * * *" Section 49 provides: "Every stairway hereafter constructed shall be as follows * * * Every stairway shall have at least one handrail, and if the stairway be five feet or more in width, shall have a handrail on each side thereof."

Whatever be the reason for the difference in these sections, the statute distinguishes between tenement houses hereafter constructed and stairways hereafter constructed. The stairway involved herein was not newly constructed at the time the building was remodeled, but remained in its original state. It was not, therefore, within the terms of section 49. None of the other sections, however, contain any requirement of a handrail. The plain meaning of the statute appears to be that, in new buildings, new stairways shall have handrails; in old buildings, only new stairways need have such handrails, whether or not the building is remodeled. In other words, in reconstructing the building, the owner came within other provisions of the act, but was not required to place handrails on a stairway already constructed.

In view of the above provisions of the statute, defendant was not guilty of a violation thereof, and no question of negligence per se arises. Hence it is unnecessary to consider the highly doubtful proposition that the absence of the handrail was the proximate cause of the injury. It appears that the trial court has placed a liability upon the landlord beyond that established by our statutes and decisions. It follows that the judgment must be, and is hereby, reversed.

In re RAUSCHENPLAT'S ESTATE.

GREVE et al. v. STAIRS et al.

L. A. 11938.

Supreme Court of California.
March 25, 1931.

1. Wills ⚷531(2).

Devise to testator's sister and other named person and "all * * * living children of my deceased half-brother," share and share alike, should be distributed per capita.

2. Wills ⚷488.

Where clause in will is unambiguous, it was error to admit evidence of deceased's declarations respecting intention (Civ. Code, §§ 1318, 1340).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Frederick Rauschenplat, deceased. From a portion of a decree of final distribution, Adolph Wilhelm Louis Greve and others appeal, opposed by James W. Stairs, as executor of the last will and testament of Frederick Rauschenplat, deceased, and others.

Reversed, with directions.

Superseding opinion in 291 P. 432.

John Carfraie Birnie, of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. J. Dubin, of San Luis Obispo, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J.

This is an appeal by the three children of Mathias Grayfe (Greve) from that portion of the decree of final distribution construing the following provision appearing in the will of Frederick Rauschenplat, deceased: "Secondly, I give, devise and bequeath all of my estate, real and personal, and wherever situate, to Wilhelmina Battie, my sister, of Hamburg, Germany; to all of the living children of my deceased half-brother, Mathias Grayfe, late of Hamburg, Germany, and to Paulina Stairs, daughter of James W. Stairs, of San Luis Obispo, California, share and share alike."

[1] The appellants maintain that it was the intention of the testator, looking at the will from all four corners, that the estate should be distributed per capita as to the persons therein named, and also per capita as to each child living of the deceased half-brother, Mathias Grayfe. Under appellants' contention, they will each receive one-fifth of the estate; whereas, under the decree of distribution, they receive but one-ninth of the decedent's property.

Appellants' interpretation of the distributive clause of the will appears to be the correct one. In Estate of Morrison, 138 Cal. 401, 71 P. 453, the residue of the estate was "to be divided between my sister Mrs. Wann and her daughters and my brother Edward Stettinius." Unlike the present case, the Morrison will contained no express provision that such residuary beneficiaries should take the estate "share and share alike." By other provisions of the will, the "daughters" were mentioned by name, and each of them left a specific legacy. It was concluded in that case that it was the intention of the testator to divide the residuum of the estate equally among the four persons per capita, and that no class composed either of the mother and daughters, or of the two daughters, was contemplated. Regarding the construction which should be placed upon the words "share and share alike," the court said: "It is further argued by appellant that the omission to add to the residuary clause of the codicil the words 'share and share alike' shows, or tends to show, that the construction above given is wrong. It is true that in the original will that expression is used three times, including the residuary clause, and is used once in the codicil. It is quite true that the words 'share and share alike' would have prevented discussion as to the intention of the testatrix; but if the language used means the same thing, and especially when such meaning is clearly consistent with all its other provisions, their absence cannot justify a different construction." (Italics added.)

A will providing that the estate be divided "Among my Brothers & Sisters children, and David R. Neil and Andrew Neil, also Lulu Keith equally," was held to be a devise to the three persons last named equally with each of the nieces and nephews per capita. Neil v. Stuart, 102 Kan. 242, 169 P. 1138.

In Hill v. Bowers, 120 Mass. 135, the testator left the residue of his estate "to the children of my brother J, * * * and to the children of my said nephew A. * * *" At the time of the testator's death there were living eight children of "J." and two of "A." It was held that each of all such children took per capita and not per stirpes.

In Lee v. Lee, 39 Barb. (N. Y.) 172, the gift of the residue was to a brother, the children of a deceased sister, and the daughter of another brother, "in equal proportions, share and share alike." It was held that each of the nieces and nephews took an equal share with the brother named as a beneficiary.

While the decisions are by no means harmonious, a fair statement of the rule appears in 2 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) 205, where it is said: "Where a gift is to the children of several persons, whether it be to the children of A and B or to the children of A and the children of B, they take per capita and not per stirpes. The same rule applies where a devise or bequest is made to a person and the children of another person; or to a person described as standing in a certain relation to the testator and the children of another person standing in the same relation. * * *" (Italics ours.)

Although the names of the children of the deceased half-brother of the testator do not appear in the will, if the thought in the mind of the testator was that a certain portion of his estate should be inherited only by immediate, living representatives of his deceased half-brother, the impossibility of designating such persons by name is clearly manifest. The words of the testator that those persons designated in the will were to take his property "share and share alike" are convincing as to his intention that the children of the half-brother, along with the others, were to take per capita and not per stirpes. This conclusion finds support in the following clause of the will wherein it is stated that, "should any of the beneficiaries named herein contest this my will the share so bequeathed to him or her hereby shall go to the other beneficiaries in equal shares." (Italics added.)

[2] The clause in the will here under consideration is not ambiguous, and it was error for the court below to admit evidence of alleged declarations of the deceased as to how he intended disposing of his property. Neil v. Stuart, supra, 102 Kan. 242, 169 P. page 1139. Sections 1318 and 1340 of the Civil Code appear to be pertinent to this inquiry.

That portion of the decree of distribution appealed from is reversed, with directions to the court below to enter its decree in accordance with the views herein expressed.

secured by a deed of trust on certain real property.

The essential facts, as we view them, are as follows: Plaintiff Drews was the owner of a ranch. He entered into an agreement to purchase from defendant Girsh another ranch, the price payable in installments. Under that contract plaintiff and his wife went into possession of the property. In order to improve it, he desired to purchase two pumps. He was at this time in default on installments under the contract and was also unable to meet other obligations. In this extremity he approached defendant Girsh and the latter agreed to stand the cost of the pumps and other necessities, provided that security was given. Security was offered in the shape of a promissory note for $1,000, secured by a deed of trust on the ranch owned by plaintiff Drews. Thereafter plaintiff changed his mind and decided to take one large pump instead of the two previously chosen; and defendant Girsh made a down payment of $125 on it. Subsequently defendant Girsh made a payment constituting the balance of $600. He also paid various sums for title insurance, taxes, hay insurance, equipment, etc. The situation, then, is as follows: Plaintiff, the purchaser under an executory contract for the sale of real property, induced his vendor to pay a number of his bills for expenses and improvements, and in return gave him a note for $1,000, secured by a deed of trust on other property. There would seem to be no doubt that the holder of the note, having given consideration, is entitled to enforce it according to its tenor.

Plaintiff contends, however, that defendant is entitled to recover only the sum of $100; and in support of this contention points to another transaction between the parties. It appears that plaintiff defaulted on his contract of purchase, and that on June 11, 1928, he gave up his interest therein by making a quitclaim deed to defendant Girsh. Plaintiff claims that any sums paid by defendant Girsh after the execution of the quitclaim deed were wholly voluntary on his part, and resulted in improvement of his own property; that therefore they cannot be included in determining the consideration supporting the note. This argument is completely answered by the following provision in the deed: "First party also quitclaims to second party the personal property described in said agreement. By accepting this deed second party waives all claims for damages against first party, or his wife, arising by reason of their occupancy or use of any of the property herein described, or in any way connected with the transaction described in said recorded agreement herein referred to. First party does not, by this deed, consent to any of the charges made in that certain memorandum delivered to first party by second party on June 8, 1928, or to the application of any part of a certain sum of one thousand dollars raised by second party on the security of certain land of first party, to any of said charges, nor does second party waive any rights thereunder, this instrument not having any bearing upon said other transaction whatever." (Italics ours.)

The plain purport of this provision, considered in the light of the circumstances, is this: Defendant Girsh had a right of action against plaintiff for the balance of the purchase price due under the contract, and gave up that right upon a return of the property by quitclaim deed. But having already paid certain sums on behalf of plaintiff, and believing himself obligated to make other payments, as, e. g., the balance of $600 due on the pump contract, defendant Girsh determined to hold plaintiff liable on his promissory note. Hence the deed was made to state expressly that this liability is unaffected by it.

Without going into a discussion of propositions of law presented in appellant's brief which have no application to the facts of this case, we conclude that there is nothing in the record to show that the liability assumed by plaintiff on his promissory note is not valid and subsisting.

The judgment is affirmed.

Sac. 4215.

Supreme Court of California.

March 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 23, 1931.

1. Evidence ⚷89.

Presumption in favor of party is dispelled by testimony of party himself or of his witnesses.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1170(9).

In automobile collision case, in which plaintiff and his witnesses testified regarding circumstances of collision, giving of instruction that law presumed plaintiff took ordinary care of his own concerns held harmless error (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Plaintiff and his witnesses testified in detail regarding plaintiff's acts and conduct just prior to and at time of collision, and defendant's witnesses gave their > version of collision, and testified regarding acts and conduct of plaintiff in connection therewith, and in other instructions jury's attention was expressly directed to evidence in case, and they were instructed that they could not find verdict in plaintiff's favor unless they found from evidence that plaintiff was in no wise guilty of negligence proximately contributing to accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by Norman Rogers against the Interstate Transit Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Superseding opinions of District Court of Appeal in 284 P. 499, 285 P. 731, and (Sup.) 290 P. 571.

Carter & Smith and Jesse W. Carter, both of Redding, Annette Abbott Adams, of San Francisco, and George Allan Smith, of Monterey, for appellant.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for respondent.

Devlin & Devlin & Diepenbrock, of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

PER CURIAM.

The appeal in this cause first came on for hearing before the District Court of Appeal of the Third District. That court affirmed the judgment of the trial court, and a petition for a transfer was thereafter filed and granted by this court. In an opinion later filed by us, we adopted in the main the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, and accordingly affirmed the judgment of the trial court. Thereafter a petition for a rehearing was filed, which was granted mainly for the reason that we desired to give further consideration to the claim that the trial court erred to the prejudice of the defendant in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 23, which reads as follows: "The burden is upon the defendant to prove the negligence of plaintiff by a preponderance of the evidence, and in considering the evidence upon this point you will keep in mind that the law presumes that plaintiff, at the time in question here, took ordinary care of his own concerns."

[1, 2] The particular portion of the instruction to which the appellant objects is that in which the court instructed the jury that "the law presumes that the plaintiff, at the time in question here, took ordinary care of his own concerns."

At the trial of this action, plaintiff not only testified as to the circumstances of the collision between the car he was driving and the auto stage of the defendant, but he produced witnesses who gave evidence, both direct and on cross-examination, of his acts and conduct just before and at the time of the collision. Whether the plaintiff took ordinary care of his own concerns while operating his car at that particular occasion was a matter of evidence established by the plaintiff and witnesses called by him in support of his claim that he did. In the face of this evidence, there was no room for any presumption. If the evidence on his part showed that he was negligent, then it cannot be said that the jury, notwithstanding this evidence, might presume that he was not negligent, or that he took ordinary care of his own concerns, which amounts to the same thing. On the other hand, if this evidence showed that plaintiff was not negligent in the operation of his car at the time of its collision with defendant's stage, then that fact was before the jury, not as the result of any presumption, but in response to testimony of witnesses testifying in the case. In either event, the jury, in determining whether the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, would look to, and be governed by, the evidence before the court, and not by any presumption. Whatever the rule may be when the evidence contrary to the presumption is produced by the adverse party, it is well established in this state that a presumption in favor of a party is entirely dispelled by the testimony of the party himself or of his witnesses. Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation, 190 Cal. 1, 9, 210 P. 269. In such a case it was error, we think, for the court to instruct the jury as to the presumption that the plaintiff took ordinary care of his own concerns.

We question, however, whether this error was of so serious a nature as to justify a reversal of the judgment of the trial court. As already stated, the plaintiff and other witnesses produced by him, including the occupants of his car, testified in detail as to plaintiff's acts and conduct just prior to, and at the time of, the collision. Witnesses produced by the defendant gave their version of the collision, in which they testified as to the acts and conduct of the plaintiff in connection therewith. In the face of this direct and positive evidence, it is hardly conceivable that the jury would have placed any great reliance, if any at all, on any presumption as to plaintiff's conduct, even though they were told by the court that they might do so. In other instructions, and particularly in defendant's instructions No. 20 and No. 27, the attention of the jury was expressly directed to the evidence in this case, and they were instructed that they could not find a verdict in plaintiff's favor, unless they found from said evidence that plaintiff was in nowise guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to said accident. Taking the instructions as a whole, we are satisfied that the jury could not have been misled by the one complained of and which contained the reference to the presumption that the plaintiff took ordinary care of his own concerns.

By section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, courts are restrained from reversing judgments on the ground of misdirection of the jury, unless after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The evidence in the case, both that on behalf of the plaintiff and that produced by the defendant, is quite full and complete upon all of the issues presented by the pleadings. While it might have sustained a verdict in favor of either party, that in behalf of the plaintiff was sufficient beyond any question to support the verdict rendered. We seriously question whether any different result would be attained by a retrial of the case under instructions with plaintiff's instruction No. 23 eliminated therefrom. There was, therefore, no miscarriage of justice, and for that reason the judgment should not be reversed.

With the exception of what was said regarding the plaintiff's instruction No. 23 in the opinion previously rendered by us, we are satisfied that it correctly determines all issues presented on this appeal. We have therefore eliminated therefrom all discussion therein in reference to said instruction No. 23, and, as thus modified, we have adopted the same as the opinion of this court. It is as follows:

"This is an appeal from a judgment for damages for injuries sustained in an automobile collision.

"At 1 o'clock p. m. on March 11, 1927, the defendant's auto stage was being driven southerly along a straight stretch of level highway in Shasta county between Anderson and Cottonwood. It was occupying more than half of the concrete portion of the roadway, and was traveling about 35 miles an hour. The plaintiff, who was an able-bodied man 30 years of age, and who had been employed by Mr. A. J. Loggie for 8 years as his auto mechanic and chauffeur, was driving his employer's Packard limousine in the same direction. The owner of the Packard with a companion occupied the rear seat.

"The concrete pavement was 15 feet wide with a 5-foot graveled shoulder sloping down to a shallow ditch on either side. At a point about 1 mile from Cottonwood the Packard car overtook the stage, and undertook to pass it on the proper side. The highway was unobstructed. No other machines were in sight. Several times the horn of the Packard was blown, and the plaintiff attempted to pass the stage, which failed to yield any portion of its position on the highway. Finally the plaintiff drove to the extreme left side of the roadway with about half of the machine traveling upon the graveled shoulder, and repeatedly sounded the horn as a warning in passing the stage. As the Packard reached a point opposite the front of the stage, the latter appeared to increase its speed. The Packard, however, succeeded in passing the stage, and for a considerable distance continued to keep its position on the extreme left side of the roadway. The defendant testified in this regard: 'I never attempted to turn in (front of the stage) at all. I kept going at the same rate of speed I was going while I was passing it.' On redirect examination he said: 'I turned slightly on the pavement, following the left side, driving straight ahead.' The machines were running about 35 miles an hour. There is a serious conflict of evidence as to just how the accident occurred. The appellant contends that the plaintiff cut in front of the stage, hooking his rear right fender over the left end of the stage bumper, and thus diverted the course of the Packard from the highway into the ditch upon the right. There is, however, ample testimony to support the plaintiff's theory that, after he had passed the stage and was proceeding along his proper side of the highway, the stage increased its speed and struck the Packard. The left angle of the stage bumper hit the rear right fender of the Packard, back of the wheel. The impact crumpled the mud guard and shoved the rear end of the car violently to the left. The plaintiff lost control of the machine, and it pitched diagonally across the highway in front of the stage into a telephone pole on the right side of the highway, cutting down the pole, upsetting and wrecking the Packard, and hurling the plaintiff from the car to the ground. The plaintiff's left foot, which was caught between the clutch pedal and the brake lever, was nearly torn off. He was taken to the hospital at Cottonwood, where his foot was amputated above the ankle. He is now forced to wear a cork foot and limb, to his great inconvenience, discomfort, and humiliation. The jury rendered a verdict in his favor for the sum of $20,000. A judgment was duly entered for this amount, from which an appeal was perfected.

"The appellant asserts that: (1) The judgment is not supported by the evidence; (2) the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; (3) the court erred in giving and refusing certain instructions; and (4) the amount of the judgment was excessive.

"There is substantial evidence to support the judgment. Three witnesses testified to substantially the foregoing statement of facts.

"The appellant contends that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cut in ahead of the stage, and that in so doing the right rear fender of the Packard hooked over the left end of the front bumper of the stage, and caused the Packard to be shunted to the right diagonally across the highway in front of the stage. The implied finding of the jury that this was not true finds ample support in the evidence. A physical inspection of the fender in question discloses no evidence that the bumper was hooked in behind it, or that the fender was drawn out by such a forcible pull as would have resulted under such circumstances. On the contrary, it appears reasonable to conclude that the fender may have been indented by a severe blow from the bumper of the stage. This accords with other corroborating testimony. It is possible the indentation in the Packard fender may have been caused by its cutting in and striking the stage bumper. Either theory of the cause of the accident is reasonably possible. We are therefore bound by the findings of the jury in this regard.

"The portion of the highway upon which the stage was traveling at the time of the accident is material in determining the question of defendant's negligence. Mr. Purdy testified in this regard: 'The stage was right over, I would say, in the middle of the highway.' On cross-examination he said: 'I would say that there was probably five feet between the stage and gravel (on the left side). * * * I looked out and saw that we cleared the stage and were by the stage, and all at once this (stage) hit us.' Mr. Loggie testified regarding the same subject: 'I would say that (the stage) had at least two-thirds of the pavement.' The portion of the highway upon which the Packard traveled after it succeeded in passing the stage is also important in determining whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Reading the record as a whole, it seems improbable that the Packard passed to the right of the central line of the highway prior to the occurrence of the collision. At least there is ample testimony to support the theory that it did not do so, and upon the contrary that the stage continued to travel with a portion of the vehicle upon the wrong side of the highway. Regarding the relative positions in which these two machines traveled upon the highway and the circumstances incident to the accident, Mr. Loggie testified:" Here follows a recital of testimony, unnecessary to be repeated, in support of the conclusion contained in the next paragraph, as follows:

[3] "The foregoing testimony sustains the implied finding of the jury that the stage driver was guilty of negligence in violating the provisions of section 126 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 558), which proximately caused the accident. It is apparent that, if the stage was traveling with a portion of the vehicle on the left side of the concrete without changing its course after the Packard succeeded in passing it, and that its speed was then accelerated so that it overtook the Packard traveling on its proper side of the highway, and struck the fender with such force as to divert the course of the Packard, hurl it into the ditch, and cause the injuries sustained by the plaintiff, this conduct on the part of the stage driver would amount to actionable negligence and render the defendant liable for damages which resulted therefrom. The evidence will sustain this theory of the accident.

"For the foregoing reasons, the evidence will also support the implied finding that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

[4] "Considering the pain, the discomfort, inconvenience, and humiliation on account of the loss of plaintiff's foot and the consequent necessity of going through life with an artificial limb, we are of the opinion that the amount of the judgment was not excessive. * * *

"The only instruction offered on the doctrine of the last clear chance to avoid an accident is assailed as inapplicable to the facts of this case and as erroneous, for the reason that two necessary elements are omitted from the hypothesis of the charge, to wit, that the plaintiff was unable to extricate himself from the peril, and, upon the contrary, that the defendant was aware of plaintiff's danger; that he was able to prevent the accident, and failed to do so. This instruction reads:

"'As the court has already stated, the claim is made by defendant that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The court instructs you that although it appears to you that the contributory negligence of plaintiff was one of the proximate causes of his injuries, yet if the defendant's agent having charge of the stage, perceived that the plaintiff, by his own negligence, had placed himself in a position of peril from which he probably could not escape, and if perceiving plaintiff's perilous condition (he) failed to exercise ordinary care and prudence to avoid injuring the plaintiff and such neglect was also a proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries, he is entitled to recover.'

[5] "The doctrine of the last clear chance applies when one is in imminent peril, but in the exercise of ordinary care is ignorant of the danger (Hoy v. Tornich, 199 Cal. 545, 553, 250 P. 565), or, knowing of the danger, is unable to extricate himself, and, upon the contrary, the accused is aware of the danger to the complainant and by the use of ordinary care may avoid injuring him, but fails to do so (Basham v. Southern Pacific Co., 176 Cal. 320, 168 P. 359; Chappell v. San Diego Ry Co., 201 Cal. 560, 258 P. 73)."

[6-9] On the plaintiff's theory of the case, based on sufficient evidence in support thereof, the doctrine of the last clear chance was applicable to the facts. But it is contended that the foregoing instruction was lacking in two elements necessary to the application of the doctrine, viz., that "the driver of the bus could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the accident after he observed plaintiff in a position of peril, and that plaintiff himself exercised ordinary care for his own safety after he found himself in a position of peril." The first element was in substance included in the instruction. The second element might well have been included, but the instruction as a whole was more elaborate and complete than the statement of the doctrine involved in Townsend v. Butterfield, 168 Cal. 564, 143 P. 760, which was held not to be prejudicial, especially since it was the duty of the defendant to prepare and present a fuller and more accurate instruction on the subject if it desired a better definition of the rule. See, also, Galwey v. Pacific Auto Stages, 96 Cal. App. 169, 273 P. 866; 14 R. C. L. § 56, p. 797.

Other instructions are complained of. The charge to the jury was full and fair, and we find no prejudicial error therein; nor does it appear that the plaintiff in his argument to the jury overstepped the bounds of propriety to such an extent as to constitute prejudicial misconduct, particularly in view of the admonition of the court with reference thereto.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNRUH v. NELSON et al.

NELSON v. UNRUH et ux.

L. A. 10092, 10093.

Supreme Court of California.

March 31, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⚿1060(2).
Depositions ⚿99, 101.

Refusal to permit plaintiff's counsel to read to defendant as witness admissions in defendant's deposition taken in prior dismissed action, and exclusion of deposition, held reversible error (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2021, subd. 1, 2022).

Admissions in form of questions and answers in defendant's deposition were excluded on objection that deposition was admissible only for impeachment, and that, witness not having yet made affirmative statement, no foundation existed for the effort. This exclusion was error, since deposition was taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 2021, subd. 1, and under section 2022 could be read on trial of subsequent action between same parties on same cause of action.

2. Depositions ⚿90, 101.

Presence of defendant whose deposition was taken under statute did not require exclusion of deposition, and it could have been offered by either party (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2021, subd. 1, 2022).

3. Depositions ⚷99.

Deposition of defendant taken in prior action dismissed before trial held admissible as affirmative testimony, not merely for impeachment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1850, 1870, subd. 2, 2021, subd. 1, 2022).

4. Witnesses ⚷305(1).

Defendant's deposition being admissible, defendant thereby waived privilege against self-incrimination (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1850, 1870, subd. 2, 2021, subd. 1, 2022).

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Reuben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Actions by Albert Unruh against Olof Nelson and by Elisa Nelson against Albert Unruh and wife, in which latter action named defendant filed cross-complaint against plaintiff and another. From adverse judgments in both actions, Albert Unruh appeals.

Reversed.

Perry F. Backus and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert A. Kidder, Jr., of Hollywood, and Earl O. Lippold, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Marcus C. Clark, of Los Angeles, for Emily Unruh.

PRESTON, J.

Two actions for damages. Cause No. 1 is for criminal conversation. Cause No. 2, by reason of the complaint and cross-complaint, contains two reciprocal causes of action for alienation of affections. Action No. 1 was preceded by the same kind of a suit between the same parties upon the same cause of action, dismissed prior to trial and judgment; these two actions followed. In the original action, which was dismissed, the deposition of defendant Olof Nelson was taken under section 2021, subdivision 1, and section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, and said defendant was therein examined and cross-examined at great length. This deposition should be specially noted as it forms the basis of the discussion to follow of the legal questions here involved.

These suits grow out of the alleged adulterous relations between Olof Nelson and Emily Unruh, wife of plaintiff Albert Unruh. Cause No. 1 is by Albert Unruh against Olof Nelson upon this claim, being a cause of action for criminal conversation. Cause No. 2 was begun as an action by Elisa Nelson against Albert and Emily Unruh, husband and wife, charging them with alienation of the affections of her husband, Olof Nelson, growing out of the same adulterous relationship above mentioned. In this latter action, however, Albert Unruh cross-complained and alleged alienation of the affections of his wife by Nelson and wife and their attorney.

Issues were joined on the two complaints and cross-complaint. The actions were not consolidated, but were tried together, one jury alone being impaneled. In cause No. 1, at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, a judgment of nonsuit was promptly given upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence. The jury were held over; plaintiff Elisa Nelson declined to proceed under the allegations of her complaint, which left only the issues tendered by the cross-complaint of Albert Unruh, who attempted to prove a cause of action, but, at the conclusion of his evidence, he met the identical fate meted out to him in the first cause of action, to wit, nonsuit upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence. Motions for new trial in both cases were made and denied. Albert Unruh is the sole appellant in both actions. The briefs are meager and unsatisfactory. Appellant gives but little consideration to any of the questions, and many of the more important ones presented by the record are not referred to at all.

We, however, propose to discuss only the legal questions growing out of the deposition taken, as above noted, and to do this without substantial aid from the briefs. At the outset, it may be here noted that in this deposition defendant Olof Nelson admits a brazen meretricious relationship with the wife of appellant, covering a period of some two or three years, with repeated acts of sexual intercourse with her at various places, vacant buildings, a territory known as "no man's land," and even in her own home. The deposition also shows a home, in which were small children, broken up, with the wife leaving the state. In short, it shows a complete case of criminal conversation (Barlow v. Barnes, 172 Cal. 98, 155 P. 457; Bedan v. Turney, 99 Cal. 649, 653, 34 P. 442), and, in connection with the other testimony, shows at least a prima facie case of alienation of affections as charged in the cross-complaint. The appellant went to trial largely in reliance upon defendant's own admissions, but he had also been alert and tapped the wires of his own home. He thereby secured and gave much damaging testimony with reference to repeated conversations between his wife and defendant Nelson of such a nature that they could have sprung only from an illicit relationship. These conversations said defendant also admitted in part, particularly admitting that he took appellant's wife to an out of the way lodging house.

When ready to present further evidence, appellant called said defendant as a witness under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court immediately ruled that leading questions would not be permitted, which of itself put appellant at a great disadvantage in attempting to wring from this defendant admissions in accord with his deposition. He then propounded to said defendant direct questions upon the subject of illicit intercourse with his wife. He was met with objections that answers would tend to incriminate said defendant, thereby invading the territory made inviolate by the Constitution. The court promptly sustained the witness in all these refusals to testify.

[1, 2] Counsel for appellant at this juncture undertook to identify and read to the witness certain admissions in the form of questions and answers thereto found in said deposition. This move was obstructed by the objection that this could be done only as a matter of impeachment, and, the witness not having as yet made an affirmative statement, no foundation existed for the effort. The court sustained this objection also. The deposition itself was then offered in evidence, and the offer was promptly denied by the court.

We need search no further for reversible error. As above noted, this deposition was taken pursuant to subdivision 1 of section 2021 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and under the express provisions of section 2022 of said Code it could be read upon the trial of a subsequent action between the same parties upon the same cause of action. Consolidated Lumber Co. v. Fidelity, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 397, 402, 119 P. 506. It is also elementary that, as said defendant was a party to the action and his deposition was taken under subdivision 1 of said section 2021, his presence would not prevent the introduction of the deposition in evidence, but it could have been offered by either party to the action. Newell v. Desmond, 74 Cal. 46, 15 P. 369; Johnson v. McDuffee, 83 Cal. 30, 23 P. 214; Adams v. Weaver, 117 Cal. 42, 49, 48 P. 972.

[3, 4] This, of course, was not merely a matter of impeachment. It was positive affirmative testimony which should have been admitted as relating to the issues tendered by the pleadings as well as "the act, declaration or omission" of the party (sections 1850 and 1870, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.). It follows also as of course that, if the deposition was admissible in evidence, said defendant had thereby waived the privilege the law throws around answers which might tend to incriminate him.

Many other questions could be discussed, but we do not deem it necessary. Throughout the presentation of the case, the court's attitude and rulings were such as to unduly restrict the attorney for appellant in the presentation of his client's cause. We have no reason to believe, however, that liberality will not be shown upon a retrial of the cause; hence we need not specify further particulars in this connection.

The judgment in each of the two above causes is hereby reversed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; CURTIS, J.; LANGDON, J.; SHENK, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.

PEOPLE v. PANTAGES.

Cr. 3398.

Supreme Court of California.

April 2, 1931.

1. Criminal law 🔑719(1).

In criminal case, argument of counsel should be based solely upon evidence.

2. Criminal law 🔑704.

Opening statement by defendant's counsel does not constitute evidence and is not binding, and therefore, in absence of bad faith, failure to make good such statement should not be argued.

3. Criminal law 🔑713.

Conviction should not rest even slightly upon dereliction, of counsel, but should ordinarily be grounded upon acts committed by defendant.

4. Criminal law 🔑704.

District attorney may in argument direct jury's attention to defendant's failure to substantiate counsel's opening statement.

5. Criminal law 🔑723(1).

In prosecution for statutory rape, prosecutors' argument, in effect, charging defendant's counsel with grossest bad faith in failing to substantiate part of opening statement, held error.

> Defendant's counsel, in opening statement, pointed out what defendant expected to prove in his defense. Defendant repeatedly but unsuccessfully attempted to introduce certain evidence to substantiate part of opening statement, whereupon district attorney and deputy in argument to jury pointed out that defendant's attorneys failed to make good fulfillment of their promise which represented only bunch of "unredeemed pledges" and in effect charged defendant's attorneys with the grossest bad faith.

6. Criminal law 🔑730(1).

Instruction to disregard improper argument does not cure error, where it appears reasonably clear that harmful result could not have been remedied.

7. Criminal law ⚷730(8).

In prosecution for statutory rape, prosecutors' argument giving their personal opinion with reference to witnesses' character or credibility held error, notwithstanding instruction to disregard.

> District attorney in substance told jury during argument that as long as he was district attorney he would not put named doctor on witness stand, and that wife of another witness appeared in desperation to support her husband's testimony. As to another witness prosecutor stated that he "is as clean as a hound's tooth and there isn't a thing against him," and as to still another that "he stands without the possibility of impeachment."

8. Criminal law ⚷730(8).

In prosecution for statutory rape, district attorney's argument based on assumption that prosecutrix was a virgin held error, notwithstanding cautionary instruction.

> Based on assumption that prosecuting witness was a virgin, district attorney made dramatic appeal to jury. At close of case, trial court instructed jury that if counsel upon either side made any statements concerning facts of case "you must be careful not to regard such statements as evidence and must look entirely to the proofs in ascertaining what the facts are."

9. Witnesses ⚷372(1).

Questions on cross-examination of witness, tending to show bias, are competent, and great latitude should be allowed in developing existence of bias (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1847, 2051).

> If witness, directly or indirectly, be induced either to give false testimony or to color truth of sworn statements, jury should be placed not merely in possession of affirmative ultimate fact of bias or denial thereof, but, if necessary, should hear basic facts, if any, upon which such conclusion is founded.

10. Witnesses ⚷372(2), 374(1).

Fact that witness may have received some favorable consideration from district attorney for favorable testimony may be disclosed by cross-examination or other evidence.

11. Witnesses ⚷372(2).

In prosecution for statutory rape, refusing to permit cross-examination of state's witness, regarding motives or state of mind, held error (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1847, 2051).

> Proposed cross-examination sought to inquire of witness whether he knew that he had been indicted in another state on various criminal charges, and whether any arrangement or promise had been held out to him by district attorney or police department or sheriff, whereby if witness should testify favorable to prosecution in instant case he might receive leniency or more favorable action in case of possible extradition.

12. Rape ⚷40(5).

In prosecution for statutory rape, evidence showing previous acts of unchastity is inadmissible for sole purpose of attacking prosecutrix's character.

13. Rape ⚷40(2).

In prosecution for rape, accomplished by force or violence, testimony showing prior unchaste acts of prosecutrix is admissible.

> Evidence under such circumstances is admissible, not for direct purpose of impeaching prosecutrix's character, but for purpose of discrediting her testimony relating to use of force or violence by defendant in accomplishing his purpose.

14. Rape ⚷40(5).

In prosecution for statutory rape accomplished by force, defendant's testimony showing prior unchastity of prosecutrix held admissible on question of use of force and consent (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3).

15. Rape ⚷40(5).

In prosecution for statutory rape accomplished by force, testimony showing previous unchastity of prosecutrix held admissible as bearing on place of imprisonment to be recommended by jury (Pen. Code, § 264).

16. Rape ⚷40(5).

In prosecution for statutory rape accomplished by force, testimony showing prior unchastity of prosecutrix held admissible as bearing on question of penetration.

> If from the evidence the jury believed that no penetration took place, defendant at most could have been convicted of no greater offense than attempt to commit rape.

17. Indictment and Information ⚷164.

"Issue of fact" in criminal cases arises from allegation of ultimate fact made by one of parties which is denied by other.

> [Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Issue of Fact," see Words and Phrases.]

18. Criminal law ⚷337.

Generally, issues of fact can only be determined by introduction of evidence made acceptable by statute or legal practice.

19. Criminal law ⟹857(1).

Jury in determining ultimate fact of either guilt or innocence should not be influenced by either pity or sympathy.

20. Rape ⟹13.

Generally in prosecution for statutory rape, consent of prosecutrix is not an issue.

21. Rape ⟹38(2).

In prosecution for statutory rape accomplished by force, evidence of prosecutrix' consent is admissible for impeachment as to manner of act and whether crime was committed.

22. Rape ⟹59(8).

In prosecution for statutory rape accomplished by force, instruction that prosecutrix' consent was wholly immaterial held prejudicial error, where evidence showing consent was admissible for impeachment purposes.

23. Rape ⟹60.

Jury's recommendation, in rape case, as to place of imprisonment, is essential, inseparable part of verdict, and therefore binding upon trial court (Pen. Code, § 264).

24. Rape ⟹38(1).

In prosecution for statutory rape accomplished by force, testimony showing facts and circumstances attending commission of offense held admissible for jury's consideration on question of place of imprisonment (Pen. Code, §§ 17, 264).

> Facts and circumstances surrounding offense, admissible, include degree of force or violence exercised by defendant, consent of prosecutrix, and any other circumstances throwing relevant and material light upon true situation of defendant and prosecutrix at and reasonably preceding time offense was alleged to have been committed.

25. Rape ⟹40(5).

Prior unchastity of prosecutrix may not be put in issue in statutory rape case, except when force is claimed to have been used.

26. Rape ⟹38(2).

In prosecution for statutory rape claimed to have been accomplished by force, accused may combat showing of force by evidence usual in force cases (Pen. Code, §§ 17, 264, and § 261, subd. 3).

PER CURIAM.

A hearing in this cause was granted in order that this court might give to the contentions of the parties, presented by extended briefs and on a voluminous record, more thorough consideration than was possible within the constitutional period. After oral argument and a careful consideration of the points involved and an examination of the record, we adopt as the opinion of this court in the main the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 1 (292 P. 500), written by Mr. Justice Houser, as follows:

Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of rape of "a female person under the age of eighteen years." He also appeals from each of three several orders by which was denied respectively his motion for a new trial, his motion in arrest of judgment, and his motion for leave to file application for probation.

It is first contended by appellant that the evidence adduced on the trial of the action was legally insufficient to support the verdict. It would serve no useful purpose to herein set forth the facts which were presented by the prosecution in substantiation of the charge made against defendant. In that regard it may suffice to state that after careful consideration of the evidence, even viewed in the light as presented by appellant, this court is of the opinion that the contention as to its legal insufficiency cannot prevail.

[1-5] Misconduct of the district attorney and of his chief deputy is urged by appellant as a reason for the reversal of the judgment and the order by which the motion for a new trial was denied. In that connection, the first specification relates to comments made by the district attorney in his argument to the jury, particularly with reference to the failure of defendant to produce evidence in support of a statement made by one of the attorneys representing defendant in his opening statement to the jury as to what defendant expected to prove in defense of the accusation of the crime, for the alleged commission of which he was then on trial. The history of such several errors of which appellant first complains is that in his argument to the jury the chief deputy district attorney made the remark that defendant's attorneys had "failed to make good the fulfillment of their promise," which represented only "a bunch of unredeemed pledges"; and that "you saw how the court repeatedly called for an offer to make competent these innuendoes——" After objection thereto by defendant, the court instructed the jury to disregard "any remarks of counsel about offers of proof." Thereafter, in presenting his argument to the jury, the district attorney referred to the same matter as that which theretofore had been commented upon by the chief deputy district attorney, to which remarks defendant again objected. Thereupon the trial court ruled that "the district attorney may call attention to the opening statement and may mention the fact that that was not sustained by evidence, and that there was no evidence to that effect." On each of several other occasions following an objection by counsel for defendant to statements contained in argument presented by either the district attorney or his chief deputy, which statement injuriously reflected upon and criticized counsel for defendant for their failure to produce evidence in substantiation of designated portions of their opening statement to the jury, the judge of the trial court not only failed to rebuke the district attorney or his chief deputy, but indicated his approval of the remark in question. An illustration of objectionable remarks made by the district attorney is the following:

"Now, ladies and gentlemen, the only reason why I am stating this thing to this jury is this: They knew in their hearts they could not prove it, they knew they had no evidence and they knew in their hearts that there was no such evidence. They had to get something before this jury. They had intimated to you, they had insinuated it to you, they had to plant a seed in your mind, and the only way in God's green world that they could get it in front of you, in the absence of some testimony, was to say it to you in their opening statement, hoping that we would overlook it in closing argument. * * * They knew in their hearts they could not prove it, for they knew it was not true, but they had to get something of that type, they had to throw up a smoke screen, and that opening statement, ladies and gentlemen of this jury, is just about in keeping with the whole character of the insinuation, the innuendoes, the aspersions on the character of that old Mrs. Pringle as she sat on the witness stand here. * * * His whole conduct, the whole conduct of the defendant, from the moment that W. I. Gilbert stood in front of this jury, has been the projection of a defense based on insinuation and innuendo and indirection without one single effort, or one single word of testimony coming from the lips of any human being to this jury to back up their insinuations. They could not do it and they knew it, any more than when Mr. Gilbert said, as a positive fact, in the same statement, that the spots on her clothing will be accounted for by her own physical condition—by her own physical condition! Where is your testimony? * * * Has there been produced before this jury one single word that would account for the presence of spermatozoa upon a dress of that girl other than from the organs of the defendant himself, Alexander Pantages? I say to you, with all the earnestness and all the candor that God has put in me, that they had no evidence, and they knew before they came here that they had no evidence as to anything of that sort. They had to implant it in your minds. They had to have it there in your mind when you heard the State's case come in, instead of waiting, as they usually do in these cases, for their opening statement at the beginning of their case they implanted the seeds of innuendo and indirection into your mind, all through the case. They have not lived up to their promise to you. They could not and they knew in their hearts that it was not true and they could not have lived up to it, and they knew when they stood here and made a positive statement of fact to this jury, and to this court, that they could not prove the things that they told you they were going to prove. * * *"

In People v. Stoll, 143 Cal. 689, 77 P. 818, the rule is stated that the only purpose of an opening statement by counsel is to apprise the jury in a general way of what is expected to be proved; but that it has no binding force as against the party in whose behalf it is made; nor can it be considered as evidence of any fact. In each of several cases where no evidence was offered in support of an opening statement made by a district attorney, the court held that, in the absence of a showing of "bad faith" on the part of the district attorney in making such statement, no reversible error was present. People v. Wong Hing, 176 Cal. 699, 169 P. 357; People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 57 P. 470, 45 L. R. A. 783; People v. Donaldson, 36 Cal. App. 63, 171 P. 442; People v. Davis, 26 Cal. App. 647, 147 P. 1184.

In the instant case the record discloses the fact that on numerous occasions occurring during the trial, owing to objections which were interposed by the district attorney and which were sustained by the trial court, unsuccessful efforts were made in behalf of defendant to introduce evidence in support of the alleged facts which, in his opening statement to the jury, the attorney for defendant had said he expected to prove, and which statement was the subject of criticism and argument by the district attorney, from which it follows that, at least legally speaking, defendant may not be said to have presented his opening statement in "bad faith."

It is clear that in the trial of an action, proper argument should be based solely on the evidence, and that if the opening statement to the jury does not constitute evidence and is not binding upon the party making it, then, in the absence of "bad faith," his failure to "make good" should not be argued by the opposite party as a reason for a verdict. The conviction of a defendant of the crime of which he is accused should rest not even slightly upon the dereliction (if any) of his counsel, but ordinarily should be grounded upon acts committed by the defendant either actually or by law imputed to him. As ruled by the trial judge, and as indicated in State v. Boyce, 24 Wash. 514, 64 P. 719, the district attorney and his chief deputy were within their legal rights in plainly and simply directing the attention of the jury to the fact that, although counsel for defendant had stated to the jury that he expected to prove certain specified facts on behalf of defendant, nevertheless no evidence had been received by the court in substantiation thereof; but when, in substance, the district attorney and his chief deputy had thus far proceeded, the limit of legitimate quasi argument in that regard had been reached. To go further (and in the face of the fact that defendant had repeatedly, but unsuccessfully, attempted to introduce evidence relating to the situation which he had stated that he expected to develop) and to charge the attorney or attorneys who represented defendant with the grossest of "bad faith" in the matter, and thereupon, impliedly at least, to predicate an impassioned and compelling argument demanding the conviction of defendant, constituted an error which was prejudicial to the substantial rights of defendant. It is a well-known fact that intemperate and inflammatory language coming from the lips of a high officer of the county claims an attention from the ordinary juror which, if similarly given voice by the defense, it does not receive. When it is considered that what was said by the district attorney was apparently with the sanction and approval of the judge of the trial court, the prejudicial effect on the substantial rights of the defendant becomes apparent.

[6, 7] The next specifications of alleged misconduct by the district attorney relate to his argument to the jury wherein he either indicated, or by his language expressly stated, his personal opinion with reference to the personal character or reliability of each of two witnesses. The several remarks to which attention herein is directed were as follows:

(a) "* * * Doctor Beatty came on the witness stand here. I did not put Doctor Beatty on, and I say to this jury right now, as long as I am district attorney of this county I will never put Doctor Beatty on the witness stand."

(b) "* * * What does Mrs. Biffle say? Mrs. Biffle, ladies and gentlemen. I feel sorry for her. She is here trying desperately to do what any wife would do, to support her husband. Mrs. Biffle never appeared in this picture. She testified that she read Mr. Biffle's testimony in the newspaper at home and that out of desperation she came down here to support her husband, but she didn't quite support him for, listen,—"

(With reference to the statement that "out of desperation she came down here to support her husband," it is contended by appellant, and not denied by respondent, that "a careful review of the testimony of Mrs. Biffle, * * * will not disclose even a remote basis" for the inference drawn by the district attorney.)

In addition to the foregoing, appellant complains of remarks made on each of two separate occasions in argument by the chief deputy district attorney, wherein he said:

(c) "* * * How about Mr. Gilbert (one of the attorneys who represented defendant), just as skilful as any of them, and a little bit worse. You know what he did in your presence. He actually asked that man Hale, who is as clean as a hound's tooth and there isn't a thing against him, 'Don't you know there are ten felony charges pending against you, or were pending against you on August 9th?'"

(d) "* * * Then I recall another which is symbolic of the fairness of these three experts engaged in this arduous defense and simply speak of the innuendo when Mr. Gordon, who otherwise stands, and who stands without the possibility of impeachment, they asked him questions about his visit to Reno. It was ruled out; it is not in the case."

In the case of People v. Alpine, 81 Cal. App. 456, 254 P. 281, 286, the record shows that the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution of the action made various remarks which reflected upon each of several witnesses who had testified in behalf of the defendant. On appeal, in considering the question generally, among other things, the appellate court said:

"The remarks of the deputy district attorney to which appellant took exception constituted misconduct of an extreme type, and the trial judge erred in not instructing the jury to disregard them. They did not present a legitimate argument upon the evidence before the jury, and, moreover, they constituted an impeachment of appellant's witnesses in a manner not contemplated by the law."

In State v. Heaton, 149 Wash. 452, 271 P. 89, 91, a situation similar to that involved herein was given consideration by the court. It was there said:

"The declarations of counsel for the state in his argument to the jury (above quoted), referring to the credibility of certain of the state's witnesses, to the effect that he had worked with them long and was in a position to know their character, transcended the bounds of legitimate argument and amounted to an attempt on the part of counsel to testify as to the witnesses' good character. Such a statement as this cannot be met by any answering argument, and it is vain to attempt to do away with the prejudicial effect of such assertions by an instruction of the court to the effect that argument of counsel is not to be regarded as evidence." (Citing authorities.)

In the case of Gutzman v. Clancy, 114 Wis. 589, 90 N. W. 1081, 1084, 58 L. R. A. 744, wherein it appeared that in his closing argument to the jury, in referring to one of the witnesses, the attorney for the prosecution had personally impeached the integrity of such witness, the conduct of the attorney was denounced and the conclusion reached that the error was so prejudicial as to necessitate a reversal of the judgment. The following excerpts from the opinion of the court will serve to illustrate the view which is generally taken with reference to such conduct:

"* * * That the statement objected to, upon its face, is improper, as an attempt to state facts to the jury as of the knowledge of the counsel, and not by way of inference from the evidence which they had a right to consider, is obvious. * * * Counsel have no right to avail themselves of the opportunity of addressing the jury in argument to make assertions upon their own knowledge, which, if admissible at all, could be so only under the sanction of a witness' oath. * * * That solemn statements of fact, not by way of argument and deduction from the evidence, but as of the counsel's own knowledge, are likely to have weight with juries, cannot be doubted. The respectability and standing of counsel only serve to enhance the peril. * * *"

In People v. Lieska, 161 Mich. 630, 126 N. W. 636, 639, where on appeal error arising from a similar situation was specified, among other things, the court said:

"* * * It has been repeatedly held by this court that, * * * it is reversible error for the prosecuting attorney to make unwarranted attacks upon respondent's witnesses calculated to arouse in the jury an unjust suspicion of their character and truthfulness. * * * Juries very properly regard the prosecuting attorney as unprejudiced, impartial, and nonpartisan, and insinuations thrown out by him regarding the credibility of witnesses for the defense are calculated to prejudice the respondent. As was said in People v. Cahoon [88 Mich. 456, 50 N. W. 384], supra, these questions and insinuations reflected upon the character of the witnesses. The prosecuting attorney has no right to discredit the witness by innuendo."

And in People v. Huff, 173 Mich. 620, 139 N. W. 1033, 1036, in which the record disclosed the fact that the prosecuting attorney adopted methods not unlike those presented for consideration in the instant case, the Supreme Court of Michigan made the statement that witnesses were entitled to respectful consideration, and not only was it the duty of the trial court to protect witnesses from insinuation and unjust and unwarranted attacks of counsel, but that: "* * * It was highly improper and reversible error for the prosecuting attorney, in the absence of testimony on the subject, to thus praise and extol the skill and standing of a witness for the people. Juries are apt to consider the prosecuting attorney as unprejudiced and impartial, and statements of fact made by him are apt to have great weight. This court has held that it is improper for the trial court to call attention to the high character of a witness in the charge. Wisner v. Bardwell, 38 Mich. 278. It is equally improper for the prosecuting attorney to go outside the testimony and make such statements."

The record herein shows that as to each of the several remarks hereinbefore set forth timely objection thereto was made by an attorney representing defendant on the trial of the action, and that in each instance the judge of the trial court instructed the jury to disregard it. It is now urged by respondent that in such circumstances any erroneous conduct in the premises committed by the district attorney, or by the chief deputy, must be deemed to have been corrected and the error thus voided. Although authorities are not lacking in their declaration of the law in substance that the effect of such prejudicial misconduct may be cured by an instruction to the jury to disregard the remark of counsel, nevertheless an exception to such general rule is noted where the misconduct is of such a character that it is reasonably clear that its harmful result could not have been obviated or remedied by an instruction to the jury to disregard it. People v. Simon, 80 Cal. App. 675, 679, 252 P. 758, and cases there cited. It is apparent that repeated acts of misconduct of the same tenor may present a situation radically different from a single isolated transgression of the same general nature; also, that a stern rebuke by the judge of the trial court to the violator of the rule which forbids conduct of the nature of that here under consideration might possibly remove the impression initiated by the misconduct in question. But, to the contrary, that a mild suggestion from such judge as to the impropriety of several separated acts of misconduct, each of the same variety as the others, might produce no result other than a possible accentuation in the minds of the members of the jury of the specific remarks which constituted the several acts of misconduct and carry with them the conviction that in their essence, aside from technical rules of legal practice, the assumed misconduct was in fact praiseworthy and in reality should be considered as entirely proper and wholly exempt from just, adverse, judicial censure, or other criticism.

[8] Another specification of error presented by appellant relates to misconduct on the part of the district attorney in that in addressing the jury he prejudicially assumed the existence in the evidence of the fact that the prosecuting witness was a virgin; and thereafter, based wholly on such assumption, made a dramatic appeal to the passion and prejudice of the jury. An illustration of each of several of the remarks made by the district attorney are the following:

(a) "* * * What did that telephone call show you or this court, or show in this case whether or not this man raped (the prosecutrix) on the night of August 9th? They put it there to do nothing more in God's world than to blame that girl's mother, to assassinate and destroy the character as that man destroyed her virginity and her body on the afternoon of August 9th, by insinuation, by indirection, by—under that guise and that camouflage. * * *"

(b) "* * * The girl sat there and finally, drive, drive, drive, when she came to the fact of the great moment of her life, and all that any woman holds dear is taken from her, not under the vows of the marriage bed, not under the vows of love given to her, but by brute force, at the hands of a fiend that afternoon, she finally broke down, and there wasn't a man or woman in this courtroom whose heart did not know that that girl broke down honestly and sincerely because of what had happened to her at the hands of this man with the polluted body and polluted soul on the afternoon of August 9th. * * *"

(c) "* * * This is the insanity that lurked in that man's polluted mind, that is the insanity, and that is the thought that was harbored by his filthy body as he struck that girl down from her girlhood and placed upon her brow, or attempted to place upon her brow, the crown of infamy by branding her a blackmailer. What do you want him to do? Are the American jurors of today, are men and women of this country, going to stand here and let that man with all of his power or authority in America cover up and brand with infamy, by reason of the very power and wealth and strength that he has, after taking this girl's virginity, after destroying her character, then to brand her with the infamy of being a blackmailer by reason of the very position he holds? That is the insanity that lurked in that man's mind that afternoon, and this jury knows in your hearts that that is the insanity that lurked in this man's mind that afternoon as he took that girl's body."

However, in connection therewith it should be noted that at the close of the case, the trial court instructed the jury that:

"* * * If counsel, upon either side, or the court have made any statements in your presence concerning the facts in the case, you must be careful not to regard such statements as evidence, and must look entirely to the proof in ascertaining what the facts are."

In the case of People v. Fong Sing, 38 Cal. App. 253, 266, 175 P. 911, 916, in dealing with an analogous situation, in part, the court used the following language:

"There is nothing we can add to what has been said in the former opinion filed herein, except to express hearty concurrence in the general animadversion of the learned lawyer upon the practice too often resorted to in criminal cases by public prosecutors of lugging into their cases in argument matters having vital bearing upon the case which have not been brought in by evidence and which are calculated to deprive an accused of that fair and impartial trial which is guaranteed to him by the Constitution and the statute laws of the state. * * * And it is equally a mistake for such an officer to suppose that it is proper for him to present to the jury anything but strictly legal evidence in support of the charge, or that it is within the sphere of legitimate argument to prejudice the standing of the accused in the minds of those who are to determine an issue so serious to him by insinuating in the course of his address that some fact bearing strongly against the accused which has not been proved by proper evidence in reality exists."

The language of the Supreme Court of this state, used by it in the case of People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 317, 328, 20 P. 719, 723, is indicative of the general view held by the several courts of last resort throughout the United States with reference to the duty of the district attorney in the prosecution of a criminal action. It is as follows:

"We have been called upon many times to caution, sometimes to rebuke, prosecuting officers for the overzealous performance of their duties. They seem to forget that it is their sworn duty to see that the defendant has a fair and impartial trial, and that he be not convicted except by competent and legitimate evidence. Equally with the court the district attorney, as the representative of law and justice, should be fair and impartial. He should remember that it is not his sole duty to convict, and that to use his official position to obtain a verdict by illegitimate and unfair means is to bring his office and the courts into distrust. We make due allowance for the zeal which is the natural result of such a legal battle as this, and for the desire of every lawyer to win his case, but these should be overcome by the conscientious desire of a sworn officer of the court to do his duty, and not go beyond it."

Without citing further authority, it may suffice to state that, particularly in criminal actions, the practice of indulging in inflammatory remarks to the jury, especially where, as here, they are founded upon facts not in evidence, is universally condemned by reviewing courts and frequently assigned as the sole cause for reversal of judgments and the award of new trials to defendants. In this connection it may be noted that the case of People v. Hail, 25 Cal. App. 342, 143 P. 803, although following a well-beaten path with reference to misconduct of the district attorney in the particular here in question, contains many appropriate comments and suggestions which well might be the subject of careful consideration. For further illustrations of the judicial attitude toward infractions of the rule, see People v. Clayton, 89 Cal. App. 405, 413, 264 P. 1105; People v. Alpine, 81 Cal. App. 456, 467, 254 P. 281; People v. Adams, 92 Cal. App. 6, 10, 267 P. 906, and cases there cited.

Although great allowance should be and universally is made by the courts for the zeal of the district attorney, especially as may be displayed by him in the heat of argument, and although, as is stated in the case of People v. Branch, 77 Cal. App. 384, 246 P. 811, 814, the remarks ordinarily made by a district attorney may be considered by the jury as "argumentative rather than evidentiary in their nature," nevertheless such an assumption regarding the effect of any and every remark made by a district attorney in his argument to the jury, wherein, either directly or by insinuation, he personally testifies to some vital fact in the case, should neither escape deserved adverse criticism from the bench as well as from the bar, nor be universally cured either by regarding it as "argumentative, rather than evidentiary," or by a general and all-inclusive instruction to the jury to disregard it.

Appellant specifies several other alleged acts of misconduct by the district attorney, or by his chief deputy, but as in principle they are more or less covered by what heretofore has been stated herein, it becomes unnecessary to devote the attention to them which otherwise they might well deserve.

[9-11] Prejudicial error is urged by appellant in that the trial court refused to permit defendant to cross-examine a witness produced by the prosecution relative to the motives or "state of mind" of such witness. It appears that the testimony given by such witness was of extreme importance to the prosecution, in that to a great extent it was corroboratory of the testimony given by the prosecutrix. In connection with the question thus presented, the record discloses that, as was indicated by admissions or statements of counsel representing defendant, and which were developed in argument had in the absence of the jury, defendant proposed to inquire of the witness whether he knew, or had information to the effect, or suspected that he had been indicted in the state of Texas on ten separate criminal charges, or on any such charge or charges; and assuming the existence of such fact or facts, what arrangements, or promises, if any, had been either expressly or impliedly made or held out to him, especially by the district attorney of the county of Los Angeles, or by any of his deputies, or by any member of the police department of the city of Los Angeles, or by the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles, or by any of his deputies, by or through which he was either told directly, or was given to understand, that by testifying in any respect favorable to the prosecution in the instant case he might expect some leniency, or at least more favorable action from the district attorney with reference to the possible extradition of the witness on the Texas indictments against him, than though his testimony were not so favorable to the prosecution. Furthermore, that in and by such proposed cross-examination, even in the total absence of any substantial foundation for the existence of any such anticipated action by the district attorney, defendant claimed the right to ascertain whether the witness had then, or ever had, a belief, or hope, or "state of mind," that by reason of his giving testimony favorable to the prosecution in the instant action he would secure, or might be likely to obtain, any favor or advantage whatsoever at the hands of the district attorney.

It should require neither argument nor authority as the basis for an assertion that if it be established as a fact that by the use of direct or even by veiled threats, or through insinuations, or innuendo, or intimidation, or menace of any sort, or by means of promises of assistance, or of influence to be exerted in his behalf, expressly made, or but ambiguously suggested by or through any one either actually or assumedly in authority in the premises, or even by an utter stranger or interloper in the proceedings, or by any way, method, or manner whatsoever, a witness be thereby induced either to give false testimony, or to color the truth of his sworn statements, the jury should be placed not merely in possession of the affirmative ultimate fact of the bias of the witness, or his denial thereof, but, if necessary, should hear the basic facts, if any, upon which such conclusion be founded. In connection with the question of law presented for consideration by this court, it appears that the only material questions which defendant was permitted to ask of and to have answered by the witness were as to whether, on the day on which the offense of which defendant was charged was committed, the witness knew that ten felony charges were pending against the witness in the state of Texas; also as to whether, prior to such date, he was aware of that fact. Each of such questions was answered by the witness in the negative. All other questions proposed to be asked of the witness by counsel representing defendant, which had any direct bearing on the motive, or "state of mind" of the witness, at the time he was giving his testimony, were excluded by the trial court. Illustrative of the questions propounded to the witness, and to which objections thereto presented by the prosecution were sustained by the trial court, is the following:

"Did you discuss with any member of the district attorney's staff, or of the police department who were connected with this case, the question as to whether or not there were ten felony charges pending against you in Texas?"

In claiming the right to cross-examine the witness concerning the alleged indictments which were then or had been pending against him in the state of Texas, defendant relied, not upon the provisions of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which relate particularly to the impeachment of a witness, but rather upon that portion of section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, in effect, provides that, notwithstanding the rule of law that a witness is presumed to speak the truth, such presumption may be repelled by evidence affecting "his motives" in giving his testimony.

As relates to the impeachment of a witness in such manner as is provided by section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorities emanating from various jurisdictions throughout the United States are not in harmony, one with the other; but as concerns the situation hereinbefore outlined, where the motive or "state of mind" of the witness is the objective of the cross-examination, the several authorities in this state are unanimous in the declaration that questions which would have a tendency to show bias of a witness are not only competent, but that great latitude in cross-examination should be allowed in developing its existence. A situation analogous to, if not identical with, that which is presented by the record herein has heretofore received consideration in each of several cases decided by the appellate courts of this state.

In perhaps what may be termed the leading case of People v. Dillwood, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 973, 39 P. 438, 439, it appears that a witness for the prosecution "admitted that he had 'pleaded guilty to stealing the Johnson cow,' and had been sent to the Whittier Reform School." Thereupon he was asked if felony charges were not then pending against him and were not pending against him before he was sentenced to the reform school. In passing upon the admissibility of the questioned evidence, the Supreme Court said:

"* * * Before the enactment of section 2051, Code Civ. Proc., the conviction of a felony could only be proved by the production of the record, if objections were made. That it may now be shown by the admission of the witness upon the stand is an exception to the general rule that the record, being the best evidence, must be produced. It is competent to show the fact that other criminal charges are pending in the same court against the witness at the time he testifies, not, however, as evidence of particular wrongful acts, for as to these he is presumed to be innocent, but as a circumstance tending to show that his testimony is or may be influenced by a desire to seek the favor or leniency of the court and prosecuting officers by aiding in the conviction of the defendant. These charges should, however, be proved by the record if objection is made to oral evidence of them."

In the case of People v. Bennett, 79 Cal. App. 76, 94, 249 P. 20, 27, the defendant was charged with the crime of murder. Touching the question of the admissibility of evidence regarding the pendency of criminal charges against a witness testifying in the case on trial, the following appears in the opinion of the court:

"The next assignment under this head arose as follows: Against the prosecution's witness Penning, there had previously been filed and were pending in the superior court of Butte county, at the time the instant case was called for trial, two criminal charges based, respectively, upon the sale and upon the possession of intoxicating liquor. Counsel for the defendant sought to bring out by the cross-examination of said witness that such charges were pending against him, and that one had been set for trial for a date some 2 weeks prior to the date fixed for the trial of the present case, but was postponed, on motion of the district attorney, to a date 2 weeks subsequent to the date fixed for the trial of the instant case. An objection by the district attorney to this proposed cross-examination was sustained by the court. The cross-examination, as the attorney explained, was designed to disclose a circumstance tending to show that the testimony of Penning for the people was or might be influenced by a hope on his part that he would or might be leniently treated by the prosecuting officers in the criminal case or cases pending against him by giving testimony which would contribute to the conviction of the defendant. We think the proposed inquiry involved a proper subject of cross-examination for the reasons stated by the Supreme Court as follows, in People v. Dillwood, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 974, 39 P. 438, and that the defendant would be entitled to prove the fact by the record if the witness denied it. 'It is competent to show the fact that other criminal charges are pending in the same court against the witness at the time he testifies, not, however, as evidence of particular wrongful acts, for as to these he is presumed to be innocent, but as a circumstance tending to show that his testimony is or may be influenced by a desire to seek the favor or leniency of the court and prosecuting officers by aiding in the conviction of the defendant.' [Citing cases.] Such testimony goes to the question of the credibility of the witness. * * *"

A similar situation was involved in the case of People v. Blackwell, 81 Cal. App. 418, 253 P. 964, 965. There the court said: "* * * The fact that a criminal charge against the witness was then pending in the same court was competent evidence, not of the truth thereof, but as tending to show that the testimony of the witness was influenced by a desire to gain the favor of the district attorney by aiding in the conviction of the defendant and thereby escaping prosecution in her own case." (Citing cases.)

The principle is also recognized in the case of People v. Hoffman, 195 Cal. 295, 309, 232 P. 974. However, it was there held not error to refuse to admit evidence to the effect that a felony charge was pending against the witness in a county in the same state other than that in which he was giving testimony; the reason assigned therefor being that the fact that he gave "testimony for the prosecution" in one county could not have led him to expect favor or leniency from any official in the county in which the charge was pending against him. It is manifest that with reference to any possible "leniency" to the witness, such a situation as was presented in the Hoffman Case does not obtain in the instant case. On the trial of the action herein, in the course of the argument among respective counsel with reference to the admissibility of the questioned evidence, it was admitted by the prosecution in the absence of the jury that, although some time preceding the date of the trial of the instant action the witness had been placed under arrest by the Los Angeles police on suspicion of the commission by the witness of the crime of robbery, and although it was known to such police officers that several indictments were then pending against the witness in the state of Texas, regarding which some telegraphic correspondence had passed between the Texas officials and the police department of the city of Los Angeles shortly following the date of his arrest, the witness was released from custody and no "fugitive" or other complaint was ever filed against him, as might have been done in accordance with the provisions of law thereunto applicable. It is clear that if extradition of the accused witness had been sought or obtained by the Texas officials, many opportunities to extend "favor or leniency" to the accused would have been possible at the hands of the district attorney of this county.

But aside from what for convenience may be termed the assumed fact that, in exchange for favorable testimony by the witness, some one in actual or presumed authority in the premises had either directly promised some sort of advantage to the witness, or had led or permitted him to expect or hope that he would be the recipient of unidentified or unspecified favors, or material advantages, from the district attorney, authorities are not lacking in the view that however ungrounded in fact, or even if the "state of mind" of a witness be based upon pure delusion, nevertheless if such "state of mind" amount to an expectation, or even a lingering or forlorn hope, that in the event that his testimony, far from being distinctly favorable to the prosecution, be evasive, or never so slightly strained or colored in favor of the prosecution, he will or may receive some favorable consideration from the district attorney, such fact may and should be disclosed to the jury through either the channel of cross-examination, or by means of the introduction of other evidence. Indicative of such assertion of the law is the following excerpt taken from the case of People v. Thomson, 92 Cal. 506, 509, 28 P. 589:

"It is elementary law, supported by all authority, that the state of mind of a witness as to his bias or prejudice, his interests involved, his hostility or friendship towards the parties, are always proper matters for investigation, in order that truth may prevail and falsehood find its proper level. If the inner workings of a witness' mind are actuating his testimony, and the workings of that mind are brought forth to the light and held up in full view before the jury, results will be obtained much more in accord with truth and justice than though the witness' testimony is weighed and measured by his words alone. * * *"

And in Farkas v. United States (C. C. A.) 2 F.(2d) 644, 647, it is said:

"The prosecuting witnesses, before the time of the trial, had pleaded guilty to an indictment in the federal court; the verdict of guilt or innocence in the instant case depended primarily upon their credibility as against that of defendant who testified in denial of the demands and threats. As bearing upon their credibility, motive for false accusations, as well as bias, was vitally relevant, and testimony tending to show such motive was entirely competent. Concededly promises of immunity are admissible; they are, however, rarely made. Inasmuch as the question involved is the motive for testifying falsely and therefore the state of mind of the prosecuting witnesses, the relevant evidence is not alone the acts or attitude of the district attorney but anything else that would throw light upon the prosecuting witnesses' state of mind. It is therefore entirely proper, either by cross-examination of the witness himself, or otherwise, to show a belief or even only a hope on his part that he will secure immunity or a lighter sentence, or any other favorable treatment, in return for his testimony, and that, too, even if it be fully conceded that he had not the slightest basis from any act or word of the district attorney for such a belief or hope. The fact that despite a plea of guilty long since entered, the witness had not yet been sentenced, is proper evidence tending to show the existence of such hope or belief."

It may also be noted that in volume 23 of American Digest (2d Dec. Ed.), and in volume 28, Third Decennial Digest, under key numbers 363, 372, and 374 of the title of "Witnesses," may be found references to many authorities which sustain the conclusion reached as to the question here under consideration.

[12-14] Further complaint is made by appellant in that the trial court refused to permit the introduction of evidence offered by defendant for the purpose of tending to show that on the date of the alleged attack herein the prosecutrix was not a virgin.

It is the contention of appellant that because the effect of all the evidence introduced by the prosecution, and especially the testimony given by the prosecutrix, was that the offense was committed, not by consent of the victim of the alleged outrage, but by force and violence used and exerted upon her person, and because the prosecutrix personally testified in great detail concerning the circumstances which, according to her testimony, surrounded the commission of the crime, and which testimony, among other things, included the statement that the last thing she remembered was the "pain" and that she "fainted," in the face of such circumstances, defendant was entitled to introduce evidence which would tend to establish the fact that on the date of the commission of the alleged offense the prosecutrix was not a virgin; from which facts appellant further contends that the jury would have the right to infer that the prosecutrix neither "fainted" nor suffered "pain" in the course of the claimed assault upon her; but, to the contrary, that her entire story of the alleged occurrence was false, and consequently that no crime was committed by defendant; or, failing in that conclusion, that if a so-called "statutory" rape of the person of the prosecutrix was committed by defendant on the date charged in the information, the act of defendant was had by consent of the prosecutrix; and which latter fact (in case the jury so found) became of great importance to defendant for the reason that by the provisions of section 264 of the Penal Code, in the event of a verdict of guilt of the defendant, the jury is charged with the duty of "recommending" to the trial court the place wherein the defendant shall be imprisoned.

Included within the corroboratory evidence which related to the commission of the offense of which defendant was accused was the testimony given by a policewoman who made statements concerning the physical appearance of the prosecutrix at a time supposedly within approximately one and one-half hours after the alleged crime had been committed. Among other things, she testified that on undressing the girl at that time, she noticed that there were spots on her dress and that as to "the appearance of her private parts, * * * the skin showed red through the hair; the hair was moist and sticky." A chemist testified that on four of the spots on the dress worn by the prosecutrix at the time when the alleged attack was made, he found "male sperm, known as spermatozoon."

Although the trial court admitted the testimony of one physician produced by defendant to the effect that a physical examination of the prosecutrix made by him within seventeen hours after the alleged attack had occurred disclosed the fact that the hymen of the prosecutrix was ruptured; that he found no "abrasions or irritations of the vagina—irritable spots"; that he saw no "signs of her (the prosecutrix) having had sexual intercourse during the preceding twenty-four hours"; that he found no "recent tear of the hymen"; nor any "tear of the perineum"—the trial court refused to permit that physician to answer either or any of the following questions which were propounded to him by counsel representing defendant, to wit: "Q. Was that a recent rupture or an old rupture? Q. Did you see any signs of any recent rupture? Q. Just describe the nature of the rupture you saw. Q. On the vagina, did you examine the vagina either before, in front of or anterior to the hymen or behind the hymen to discover whether or not there was any abrasions of any character? Q. Was there anything in your examination to indicate to you as a physician and surgeon whether or not that girl had had sexual intercourse with anybody 17 hours before or approximately 17 hours before you made your examination? Q. Are you able to tell whether a young girl of 17 years of age has been deflowered within 24 hours of a vaginal examination? Q. Describe this hymen that you discovered in this girl on the 10th day of August."

A second physician, who also had made a physical examination of prosecutrix, testified that in so doing he had used both a speculum and "two fingers." Thereupon he was asked by counsel for defendant each of the following questions, none of which, by order of the trial court, was he permitted to answer, to wit: "Q. Was there any pain or discomfort (referring to the digital examination and instrumental examination)? Q. How large size a speculum did you use, medium or small? Q. Did you find any new or any old ruptures of any kind? Q. Did you find any old ruptures of any kind?"

Similarly, by order of the trial court, a third physician, who likewise had made a physical examination of the prosecutrix, was not permitted to answer either of the following questions which were propounded to him by counsel for defendant: "Q. Did you discover any conditions, scars or broken hymen or anything that had been broken in your opinion within the last week preceding the examination? Q. Did you find any evidence that she had had intercourse within a month before? Q. Did you find any evidence that she had had intercourse before? Q. Did you find any old scars on the hymen? Q. Did you find any recent scars on the hymen? Q. What was the condition of the vagina?"

The authorities in this state appear to fairly establish the rule that on a charge of rape of a female person under the age of eighteen years, where the act is alleged to have been accomplished with the consent of the victim of the assault, evidence of previous acts of unchastity is inadmissible for the sole purpose of attacking her character. People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103, 72 P. 838; People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 P. 622. But equally well established is the principle that where the defendant is charged with the crime of rape alleged to have been committed on the person of a woman over the age of eighteen years, accomplished by means of force or violence, it is error to exclude evidence which tends to show prior unchaste acts of the prosecutrix either with the defendant or with other men. People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 57 P. 885; People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506; People v. Degnen, 70 Cal. App. 567, 590, 234 P. 129; People v. Biescar, 97 Cal. App. 205, 275 P. 851. See, also, Lusty v. State, 97 Tex. Cr. R. 167, 261 S. W. 775; Weaver v. United States, 55 App. D. C. 26, 299 F. 893; Fields v. State, 47 Ala. 603, 11 Am. Rep. 771. The distinguishing principle between the two lines of authorities is that, as to a minor female child under the age of eighteen years, she is legally incapable of giving her consent to the act; while as to a woman over the age of eighteen years no such legal restriction obtains; and as to the latter, the evidence is admissible, not for the direct purpose of impeaching her character, but for the purpose of discrediting her testimony relating to the use of force or violence by the defendant in accomplishing his purpose. As is said in People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 293, 39 P. 622, 623, and repeated in People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 152, 57 P. 885: "This class of evidence is admissible for the purpose of tending to show the nonprobability of resistance upon the part of the prosecutrix; for it is certainly more probable that a woman who has done these things voluntarily in the past would be much more likely to consent than one whose past reputation was without blemish, and whose personal conduct could not truthfully be assailed. * * *"

It is easily perceivable that if previous acts of unchastity on the part of a woman over the age of eighteen years tend to discredit her testimony to the effect that force was used by the defendant in the commission of the act, likewise would evidence of previous acts of unchastity by a girl under the age of eighteen years tend to discredit her testimony that in accomplishing his purpose the defendant exerted force and violence.

But, as is indicated in the opinion rendered by the Supreme Court of this state in denying a petition for hearing in that court after judgment rendered by the District Court of Appeal in the case of People v. Jones, 76 Cal. App. 144, 157, 244 P. 101, 106, evidence of consent on the part of the victim of the assault, even though she be under the age of eighteen years, if she claim that the act was committed by force and violence, is admissible not only for the purpose of "impeachment as to the manner in which the act was accomplished," but as well for the purpose of laying a foundation "for impeachment as to whether the crime was committed at all." In that case, the defendant was convicted of the crime of rape of the person of his stepdaughter, of the age of fifteen years. On the trial of the action, by order of the trial court, the defendant was precluded from ascertaining by cross-examination of the prosecutrix whether the act of which complaint was made was accomplished with her consent. On appeal, the District Court of Appeal upheld the ruling thereon made by the trial court. Thereafter, in ruling on a petition for hearing of the appeal by the Supreme Court, in part the latter court used the following language:

"As a matter of law, however, we would be constrained to hold as error the ruling of the trial court sustaining objections to the cross-examination of the prosecutrix as to whether she consented to the act of sexual intercourse or whether it was committed by fear or force and against her will. We can well understand that, if she had claimed the act was committed by force, how her claim might have laid the foundation, not only for impeachment as to the manner in which the act was accomplished, but also under certain circumstances it might have laid the foundation for impeachment as to whether the crime was committed at all. * * * As an abstract question of law, however, we cannot approve of the court's ruling in sustaining the objections to the questions asked as to whether she resisted the defendant's acts, for the reason that the evidence sought to be elicited tended to disclose the circumstances of the crime, and it could not properly be excluded on the theory that the prosecutrix, being under the statutory age, all inquiry as to the circumstances of the crime was therefore cut off. This evidence was not offered as a justification or excuse for the commission of the offense, but was offered as constituting a part of the crime charged. * * *" See, also, People v. Fultz, 109 Cal. 258, 41 P. 1040.

In the instant case, the prosecutrix having testified to the effect that the alleged crime was accomplished by defendant by means of force and violence, this court is constrained to follow the suggestion made by the Supreme Court in the case last cited, in substance that evidence of consent on the part of the prosecutrix was admissible "not only for impeachment as to the manner in which the act was accomplished, but also * * * for impeachment as to whether the crime was committed at all." Although not conclusive evidence of unchastity, it is manifest that one of the items of evidence which would tend toward a conclusion that, prior to the date on which it was charged that defendant had committed the crime, the prosecutrix had been guilty of unchaste acts, would be that her hymen was ruptured, and that the scars, if any, were not of recent origin. But if with such and other evidence, which might possibly be introduced on the trial of the action, the jury should believe that preceding the alleged attack the prosecutrix was lacking in virtue, a conclusion that the testimony of the prosecutrix relating to the force and violence exerted by defendant was not to be believed, and consequently either that no crime was committed by defendant, or that, if committed, the prosecutrix consented thereto, might readily result. "* * * For it is certainly more probable that a woman who has done these things voluntarily in the past would be much more likely to consent than one whose past reputation was without blemish, and whose personal conduct could not truthfully be assailed." People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 293, 39 P. 622, 623; People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 152, 57 P. 885.

[15] Assuming that the jury should so far discredit the story of the alleged attack as narrated by the prosecutrix as to produce the conviction in the "mind" of the jury that such testimony was wholly unworthy of belief, the acquittal of the defendant would naturally follow. On the other hand, if from the evidence in the case the jury should believe that under the provisions of the statute the person of the prosecutrix had been raped by defendant, but that the act was committed with the consent (in fact, if not in law) of the prosecutrix, in view of the provision of section 264 of the Penal Code that the crime of rape of the character of that here under consideration is punishable "either by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fifty years," and that "the jury shall recommend by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison," evidence of the former unchastity of the prosecutrix became and was of vital importance to the defendant for the purpose, if possible, of ameliorating the punishment which the jury might recommend that defendant be obliged to suffer, that is, primarily, whether in the state prison or in the county jail. Furthermore, it will be remembered that the prosecutrix testified that when the act was being committed by defendant the last thing she remembered was the "pain" and that she "fainted." It is manifest that if evidence had been admitted which would have had a tendency to establish the fact not only that prior to the date of her alleged rape by defendant her hymen had been ruptured, but that theretofore she had been guilty of acts of unchastity, the question of whether on the occasion here under discussion she suffered any considerable pain, or that she fainted, would have demanded the careful consideration of the jury; and if the jury had disbelieved her statement as to the pain which she said she suffered, or that she fainted, under the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure that "a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others," the jury might have cast aside her entire story, or adopted that part of it, if any, which from other evidence in the case it believed to be true, with a result or results similar to that hereinbefore indicated.

Adverting to the combined testimony given by the policewoman and the chemist, who were introduced by the prosecution, to the effect that four certain spots found on the dress of the prosecutrix contained "male sperm, known as spermatozoon," together with the further assumed fact, as later appears from the testimony of the same chemist, that such sperm came from the person of one about the age of defendant, it becomes plain that a third reason exists for the legal admission of the evidence proposed to be elicited by defendant with reference to the virginity of the prosecutrix. It should be apparent that defendant was not bound or concluded by the whole or any part of such testimony. Nor should his negations or disavowals, if any, necessarily be limited to a personal general denial on his part either of the commission by him of the offense of which he was accused, or to a specific denial that the "male sperm, known as spermatozoon," which assumedly were found on the dress of the prosecutrix, came from the defendant. In other words, defendant was entitled to combat and refute the effect of the evidence against him in any legitimate manner—either by direct or by circumstantial evidence—which, in its logical conclusion, either might or would imply either a direct contradiction of the damaging evidence, or amount to a denial thereof by way of inference. And so, if by establishing, if he could, that the ruptured hymen of the prosecutrix was not of recent origin; that the prosecutrix was not a virgin; and that circumstances existed in the comparatively recent life of the prosecutrix from which it legally might have been inferred that she had indulged in acts of unchastity with some person other than defendant—possibly the jury might have doubted that the questioned spots on the dress of the prosecutrix resulted from the alleged rape of the prosecutrix by defendant—which conclusion necessarily would have resulted in the destruction of an important link in the chain of circumstances tending to prove the guilt of defendant.

[16] It is also apparent that several of the questions to which reference hereinbefore has been had, which were asked of the physicians who were called as witnesses by defendant, and which questions, by order of the trial court, were not permitted to be answered, were proper for the reason that on the answers thereto might have depended a conclusion by the jury as to whether any penetration in fact had resulted from the alleged attack by defendant on the prosecutrix. If, from the evidence, the jury had believed that no penetration took place, at most, defendant could have been convicted of no greater offense than attempt to commit rape.

Several different specifications of error presented by appellant which are closely related to the question last hereinbefore given consideration by this court may be grouped together. They concern, first, the giving of several instructions which are to the effect that in trying issues of fact in the case, the jury should not be influenced by sympathy or pity for defendant; and that whether the victim of the alleged assault consent to the act, or resist the attack made upon her, is wholly immaterial; secondly, the question is presented whether, in the event of a verdict of guilty, for the purpose of enabling the jury to determine either the place where the defendant should be imprisoned, or, in effect, the extent of the punishment which he should suffer, the court erred in excluding evidence from which the jury would have had the right to infer that the act was not committed by or through the use of force and violence, but, to the contrary, was accomplished by and with the consent of the prosecutrix.

[17-19] In considering whether sympathy or pity of the jurors for defendant should be legally declared to have no part in a determination of the "issues of fact," in order that a better understanding of the situation may be had, it becomes advisable to more clearly define what is meant by the expression "issues of fact." Having reference to legal practice, an issue of fact arises from an allegation of an ultimate fact made by one of the parties to the controversy which is denied by the other. Ordinarily, the only manner recognizable in a court of law for the determination of an issue of fact is by the introduction of evidence made acceptable by the statutes or by established legal practice. Nowhere, at least in civilized countries, is a solution of the ultimate facts or the "issues of fact" upon which a judgment may rest made dependable upon human emotions, or particularly upon the sympathy or the pity for either of the litigants by any person who may be called upon to judicially decide the controversy. If such were the case, no necessity would exist for, nor convenience or social protection require, laws, rules, or regulations of any sort. The more needy or distressed the litigant, the more certain would be the assurance of a judgment in his favor; and the more affluent or powerful suitor would be an easy financial prey to his impecunious or afflicted legal antagonist. From a legal standpoint, it would appear plain that in performing the duty of determining the ultimate fact of either the guilt or the innocence of a defendant, the jury should be uninfluenced by, and unmindful of, either pity or sympathy.

[20-22] The relevancy of whether in the instant case the prosecutrix consented to the accomplishment of the act for which defendant herein went to trial in the lower court has hereinbefore received some attention. It is well settled that on the trial of a so-called "statutory" rape case, ordinarily the consent of the prosecutrix is not an issue; but, as was decided by the Supreme Court in its order denying a hearing therein in the case of People v. Jones, 76 Cal. App. 144, 157, 244 P. 101, 106, where the prosecutrix, although under the age of eighteen years, testifies that the rape of her person was accomplished by force or violence exerted upon her by the defendant, evidence of consent becomes admissible not only for the purpose of "impeachment as to the manner in which the act was accomplished," but also for the purpose of laying a foundation "for impeachment as to whether the crime was committed at all." It would follow that, at least as far as concerns "impeachment" in those respects to which attention has been particularly directed, it is not true, as stated in the instruction, that whether the prosecutrix "consented" to the accomplishment of the alleged act of which defendant was accused was "wholly immaterial"; and at least to that extent, the instruction in question was erroneous and prejudicial.

With reference to the point that, assuming a situation where, under the evidence relating strictly to whether the offense was committed by the defendant, the jury has unanimously agreed upon a verdict of "guilty," the question of whether thereafter, for the purpose of reaching a conclusion as to the place where the defendant shall be imprisoned, or, in effect, the extent of the punishment which shall be imposed upon him, the jury has the right to consider the circumstances which surrounded the commission of the act, remains for consideration.

[23-24] On examination of the language of section 264 of the Penal Code, it will appear that a defendant who is convicted of the crime of rape is punishable either by imprisonment in the county jail or by imprisonment in the state prison; that the term of imprisonment in each place is indeterminate, in that if it be in the county jail, it may be for any length of time not more than one year; and if in the state prison, it may be for any period of time not exceeding fifty years. Furthermore, that it becomes the duty of the jury to "recommend" by its verdict whether the imprisonment shall be in the county jail or in the state prison.

In considering the provisions of the statute, perhaps the first question which suggests itself is whether the "recommendation" is in fact a part of the verdict of the jury and as such is binding on the trial court. In a rape case, as far as concerns the exercise of discretion by the jury in its determination as to the place of punishment of the defendant, it is not unlike the "discretion" which is likewise conferred upon the jury where a verdict of "guilty in the first degree" has been reached in a murder case. Among other things, section 190 of the Penal Code provides that "every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death, or confinement in the state prison for life, at the discretion of jury trying the same. * * *"

On the trial of the action in the case of People v. Hall, 199 Cal. 451, 249 P. 859, the jury returned a verdict by which it found the defendant guilty of the crime of murder, but that it could not "come to an unanimous agreement as to degree of punishment." On appeal, it was held by the Supreme Court that, as returned, the verdict was incomplete; that necessarily a proper verdict in the premises should embrace two constituent elements, "first, a finding that the accused is guilty of murder in the first degree; and, secondly, legal evidence that the jury has fixed the penalty in the exercise of its discretion."

In the case of People v. Sachau, 78 Cal. App. 702, 248 P. 960, in returning a verdict of "guilty" against a defendant who was charged with the crime of rape, the jury failed to make any "recommendation" as to the place where the defendant was to be imprisoned. Held, that the verdict was so defective as to constitute it a nullity and that a new trial should be granted. To the same effect, see Weatherford v. State, 43 Ala. 320.

And in People v. Pratt, 67 Cal. App. 606, 228 P. 47, 48, in which it appeared that the appeal was taken from a judgment which followed a conviction of the crime of rape, in commenting on the language employed in section 264 of the Penal Code, it was remarked that "it will be observed that under this section a minimum sentence may be imposed by the jury"; also, that the last amendment by the Legislature of the statute "emasculated" from the former statute "the age of the female, leaving it discretionary with the jury to determine by their verdict whether in any case * * * an offense charged under subdivision 1 of section 261 was a misdemeanor or a felony."

That in a prosecution of a defendant for the commission by him of the crime of rape, the jury has power to "recommend" the punishment which shall be inflicted, and that such "recommendation" must be carried into execution, is decided in the case of People v. Rambaud, 78 Cal. App. 685, 248 P. 954.

From the foregoing authorities it may safely be deduced that in a prosecution of a defendant on the charge of rape, in the event of a verdict of guilty, the "recommendation" by the jury as to the place where defendant shall be imprisoned is an essential, inseparable part of the verdict and as such is conclusive and binding upon the trial court as far as the pronouncement by it of the ensuing judgment is concerned.

As hereinbefore indicated, the provisions of section 190 of the Penal Code which deal particularly with the discretion of the jury in determining the penalty which shall be inflicted upon a person found guilty of murder in the first degree, are not unlike those terms of the statute here under consideration which provide that "by their verdict" the jury shall recommend whether the punishment of a guilty defendant shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison. In that connection it becomes relevant to consider the view taken by the courts of appeal of this state where the question submitted has had to do with murder cases.

In People v. Atherton, 51 Cal. 495, following a statement in substance that it is the duty of the jury to determine whether the defendant shall suffer the extreme penalty of the law, or imprisonment in the penitentiary, it is asserted in the opinion that in reaching a conclusion as to what penalty shall be inflicted the jury should be influenced by "a consideration of the degree of atrocity with which the particular murder has been attended."

The case of People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387, among other questions, involved that of the admissibility of evidence of the fact that at the time the murder was committed the defendant was an inmate of the state prison where he was already serving a "life sentence." It was ruled that, in order that the jury might exercise the discretion vested in it by the statute "in a wise and intelligent manner, the jury should be put in possession of all the facts of the case," which included the particular evidence in question.

In the murder case of People v. Perry, 195 Cal. 623, 639, 234 P. 890, 897, in which was involved the question of the materiality of the assumed mental deficiency of a defendant on the punishment which, under the provisions of section 190 of the Penal Code, the jury was authorized to prescribe, among other things, the court said: "* * * It is the jury's right and duty to consider and weigh all the facts and circumstances attending the commission of the offense, and from these and such reasons as may appear to it upon a consideration of the whole situation, determine whether or not, in the exercise of its discretion, life imprisonment should be imposed rather than the infliction of the death penalty. * * *"

However, in People v. Troche, 206 Cal. 35, 47, 273 P. 767, 772, the rule is declared to be that the insanity of a defendant cannot be used for the purpose of reducing his crime from murder in the first degree to murder in the second degree; and in People v. Golsh, 63 Cal. App. 609, 219 P. 456, evidence of sunstroke of the defendant, which rendered him subject to "blinding fits of passion," was held inadmissible for the purpose of enabling the jury to determine what punishment the defendant should be compelled to suffer for the commission by him of the crime of murder; it being substantially declared in each case that if the defendant was mentally responsible, he should suffer the same penalty which any sane person would be obliged to suffer, and, if mentally irresponsible, he should be acquitted. But in the Troche Case the court repeated and affirmed the general rule that "the only evidence admissible for the purpose of enabling the jury to determine whether the death penalty or life imprisonment should be imposed in the event the defendant should be found guilty of murder in the first degree was the evidence which the court did admit, and which concerned 'the circumstances connected with the offense.' * * *"

In the case of People v. Dice, 120 Cal. 189, 202, 52 P. 477, 483, it appeared that in instructing the jury upon the two several degrees of murder, as well as upon the crime of manslaughter, the trial court stated to the jury the punishment which, upon a verdict of guilty as to either of such offenses, it would be the duty of the court to impose in pronouncing judgment. In commenting upon such practice, the Supreme Court said in part that "to do so is, of course, necessary in instructing the jury upon their power and duty in the event that they should render a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. * * *"

The only cases to which the attention of this court has been directed which in any manner militate against the rule that for the purpose of determining the extent of punishment which should be prescribed for a guilty defendant the jury should "be put in possession of all the facts in the case" are those of People v. Witt, 170 Cal. 104, 148 P. 928, 930, and People v. Clayberg, 26 Cal. App. 614, 147 P. 994. On examination of each of such cases it will be disclosed that the situation therein differs somewhat from that in the instant case, and that the principle of law therein announced may be distinguished from that announced in the authorities hereinbefore cited. On the trial of the action in the former case, in mitigation of any possible punishment for the commission of the offense, the defendant claimed the right to introduce evidence relative to his character and habits. It was not contended by the defendant that the offered evidence was relevant or material on an issue of either the guilt of the defendant, or the degree of the crime, but that it was offered on the theory that it was competent because the jury had the right "to assess the punishment." The ruling was that: "* * * We are of the opinion that our law does not contemplate any such independent inquiry on a trial for murder, and that the determination of the jury, under the provisions of section 190, Penal Code, as to death or life imprisonment, is necessarily to be based solely on such evidence as is admissible on the issues made by the indictment or information and the plea of the defendant. * * *"

In the instant case, the issues of the virginity of the prosecutrix, as well as of her consent to the act of which she complained, as hereinbefore has been declared, were particularly before the court by reason of the fact that the prosecutrix testified that the offense was committed by defendant by means of force and violence. (People v. Jones, 76 Cal. App. 144, 157, 244 P. 101); from which circumstance it would follow that the case of People v. Witt, 170 Cal. 104, 148 P. 928, far from being an authority against the rule by which the questioned evidence became admissible for the purpose of determining the punishment to be inflicted upon the defendant, is at least a negative statement of affirmance of the rule. In the latter case (People v. Clayberg, 26 Cal. App. 614, 147 P. 994, 997), which was a prosecution for "statutory" rape, the decision related to an instruction requested by the defendant to be given to the jury, but which was refused by the trial court. With reference thereto the following excerpt from the opinion of the appellate court will disclose several objectionable features which appear upon the face of the requested instruction, and which alone should have justified its refusal by the trial court, to wit: "* * * Said instruction related to the power vested in juries by section 264 of the Penal Code (Stats. 1913, p. 212), in cases arising under subdivision 1 of section 261 of said Code, to determine practically the nature and extent of the punishment which may be inflicted. By the terms of the former section, it is incumbent upon the jury, where the prosecution is based upon subdivison 1 of section 261, to determine whether the defendant, if convicted, shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail or the state prison. The rejected instruction explained the law as it is declared in those sections of the Code, and proceeded to declare that it was the duty of the jury to consider all the circumstances of the present case with a view to a just determination of which mode of punishment authorized by said section 261 'will best conserve the interest of society and the interest of the defendant,' in the event that they found the defendant guilty. The instruction also had something to say about the policy of the law being opposed to the infliction of 'unusual or severe punishment,' etc., which statement could have no just place in the court's charge; it being argumentative in character. The instruction was properly refused. * * *"

However, after having decided that the defendant was not entitled to have the instruction, as offered, given to the jury, the appellate court made the following comment:

"* * * The court, in its charge, told the jury of the power and duty resting upon them by virtue of the provisions of section 264 of the Penal Code in the matter of designating the prison in which the defendant should be incarcerated in case of his conviction of the crime charged (the crime charged here being based on subdivision 1 of said section 261), and the jury, heeding that instruction, by their verdict, designated the state prison as the place of punishment. * * *"

It will thus be noted that the opinion contains no limitation upon the principle announced in People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387, to the effect that (syllabus) "in order to exercise the discretion vested in them as to the penalty in a wise and intelligent manner, the jury should be put in possession of all the facts in the case. * * *"

Upon further examination of the language of section 264 of the Penal Code, it will appear that it provides that if a defendant should plead guilty to the accusation, the punishment for the commission of the offense "shall be in the discretion of the trial court"; similarly as the punishment therefor is vested in the jury where the defendant has been found guilty after trial by jury. It also may be remembered that under the provisions of section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution, "a trial by jury may be waived in all criminal cases." Assuming that a defendant charged with the crime of "statutory" rape should either plead guilty, or that he should waive a jury, and after trial by the court without a jury, should be found "guilty," it would seem unlikely that it would be seriously contended that for the purpose of determining the place where the defendant should be incarcerated, the trial judge would be powerless to inquire into "the degree of atrocity with which the particular (rape) had been attended" (People v. Atherton, 51 Cal. 495), or that in order to exercise the discretion vested in the trial court "in a wise and intelligent manner, the (trial court) should (not) be put in possession of all the facts of the case" (People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387). If, in a murder case, in determining the penalty which should be imposed for the commission of the crime "the jury should be influenced by the degree of atrocity with which the particular murder has been attended," it is difficult to understand why in a rape case the same rule should not obtain; that is, why the jury in determining the place or extent of confinement should not be influenced by the degree of brutality, if any, which was exerted by defendant in the commission of the offense; or if there was no brutality, but, to the contrary, the "rape" was accomplished either by the consent of the prosecutrix, or by her solicitation, or by her insistence, or by her procurement in any way, why the jury should not properly be influenced by such a circumstance. It is apparent that in order that the jury may determine the matter "in a wise and intelligent manner," it should "be put in possession of all the facts of the case." People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387. It is but reasonable that, if in the administration of justice it be desirable or essential that in determining the punishment which a defendant should suffer, the trial court should inquire into all the facts in the case, just so should the jury be likewise enlightened in order that its quasi-judgment be just to the defendant. Neither the judge nor the jury, acting in his or its several judicial capacity, should be either required or expected to act blindly in the premises. No relevant light, however small or apparently insignificant, which might aid the tribunal or the judicial arm of the court in the conscientious discharge of its respective duty should be withheld or denied. To the contrary, everything relevant and material to the inquiry should be placed before the judge or the jury in order that the proper judicial discretion may be wisely, fairly and intelligently exercised. Because no exact words may be found in the particular statute by which such a power is conferred on the judge or the jury, does not constitute a barrier or a sufficient reason why a reasonable and humane view should not be taken of the intent of the Legislature in enacting the statute. To say that with no knowledge of attendant circumstances the jury should be called upon to nominate the place, only, where the defendant should expiate his crime, would be not only unjust to the defendant, but would amount to the recognition of a principle in the administration of justice that would be founded upon pure conjecture.

Even though in length of time a county jail sentence, following a conviction for the commission of a given crime, might be equal to or even exceed a sentence in the state prison rendered in pursuance of conviction of a like offense, as a matter of statutory provision the one would amount to a misdemeanor only, while the other would be a felony. Section 17, Pen. Code. * * * The record in the instant case discloses the fact that the evidence introduced by the prosecution tended to prove that the act of which defendant was accused was accomplished by means of force and violence. In the "statutory" rape case of Lusty v. State, 97 Tex. Cr. R. 167, 261 S. W. 775, 776, in the course of the opinion it is remarked that "the proof of force tends to cause the jury to assess a high penalty, and when it is relied on by the state the accused should be permitted to combat by the evidence usual in force cases." * * *

On the petition for hearing it was urged by the respondent that the foregoing determination as to the right of the appellant to disclose the criminal proceedings pending against the witness Hale in the state of Texas, for the purpose of showing the state of mind and motive of the witness in testifying as he did for the prosecution, is in conflict with the case of People v. Hoffman, 195 Cal. 295, 232 P. 974. We do not so conclude. The Hoffman Case was a criminal prosecution in the county of Imperial and it was sought to show that the witness Cornelison, testifying on behalf of the state, was influenced in favor of the prosecution because of a criminal charge pending against him in the county of Orange and in the hope that he would be favored in so testifying by the authorities of Imperial county. It was held that the fact that the witness testified for the prosecution in Imperial county could not lead him to expect favor or leniency from any of the Orange county officials. The obvious reason behind the ruling was that the Orange county officials had no responsibility for, or duties to perform, or authority to exercise in connection with, the prosecution in Imperial county. In the present case the officials of Los Angeles county, including its peace officers and its district attorney, had certain duties to perform in connection with the detention, if necessary, of the witness Hale in the event extradition were demanded by the authorities in Texas as provided by sections 1548 to 1557 of the Penal Code. In fact, communications had passed between the Los Angeles authorities and those of San Antonio, Tex., and the witness Hale was actually under surveillance. The situation here is therefore quite different from that disclosed in the Hoffman Case.

[25, 26] From what has hereinbefore been stated with reference to the decision of this court in denying the petition for hearing in the case of People v. Jones, 76 Cal. App. 157, 244 P. 101, it should be understood that the prior unchastity of the prosecutrix may not be put in issue in a statutory rape case except when force and violence is claimed to have been used in the commission of the offense. The present holding is definitely confined to a case where such force and violence was claimed to have been used. Because of the great disparity between the punishments which may be meted out by the jury in rape cases under our present law and the abhorrence naturally entertained by jurors when force and violence is alleged or claimed to exist under the evidence, we think the sane, just, and reasonable rule to apply is to permit the accused to combat the showing of force and violence by the evidence usual in force cases when the prosecution is under subdivision 3 of section 261 of the Penal Code. It may be said that the cases relied upon by the respondent expressing the view that in statutory rape cases the prior unchastity of the prosecutrix may not be shown are cases where no discretion was vested in the jury as to the extent of the punishment, and that the cases in this state expressing the same view were decided before the amendment in 1923 of section 264 of the Penal Code vesting the jury with such discretion, or were cases where force and violence were not shown or claimed.

While it is our conclusion that this judgment must be reversed, we feel bound to state that the instances of misconduct of the district attorney hereinbefore set forth would not, standing alone, necessarily require such a result. The other errors, however, were in our opinion vitally prejudicial, and considered together with the misconduct complained of, warrant the conclusion that the defendant was not lawfully convicted.

Numerous additional contentions by way of errors of law and misconduct of the jury are urged by reversal, but as the same or similar situations are not likely to occur on a retrial, these points need not be further commented upon.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. The appeal from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment and the appeal from the order denying the defendant leave to file an application for probation are and each of them is dismissed.

We dissent: SEAWELL, J.; CURTIS, J.

WASTE, C. J.

I concur in the judgment of reversal because of the intemperate atmosphere in which the case was tried. The prosecution no doubt labored under the stress of public opinion and excitement, at times confronted with considerable provocation; but the testimony of the prosecutrix is so improbable as to challenge one's credulity, and the jury should have been permitted to consider the evidence uninfluenced by the incidents and errors discussed in the main opinion. At the same time, I desire to emphasize the assertion in that portion of the opinion of this court which has been added to the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in which it is held that the instances of misconduct of the district attorney would not, standing alone, necessarily require a reversal. Any seeming conflict or inconsistency in the two parts of the decision should be resolved in favor of the declaration of this court on that question.

HANSEN et al. v. BURFORD et al.

L. A. 10557.

Supreme Court of California.
March 30, 1931.

1. Joint adventures 🔑7.

Contract for sale of lots to persons agreeing to obtain loans and erect buildings thereon held to place construction of buildings under their control and management as independent contractors, though vendors visited property during construction.

2. Joint adventures 🔑7.

Contract for sale of lots to persons agreeing to construct buildings thereon held to show intent that vendors should not be liable for cost of labor and materials, though entitled to participate in profits from resale of buildings.

3. Joint adventures 🔑7.

Vendors' contractual right to participate in profits from resale of buildings erected on lots by purchasers held not right to real estate agents' commission.

> The agreement did not make payment of profits to vendors dependent on their procuring purchaser, but provided for their participation in profits in addition to receiving notes for price, none of which was paid in cash.

4. Joint adventures 🔑1.
Partnership 🔑56.

Evidence held insufficient to establish vendors' liability as partners or joint obligors for price of lumber, used in erecting buildings on lots, on theory that they permitted themselves to be held out as such to sellers.

> Vendee, who purchased lumber, testified that he told sellers that vendors were interested with him, but seller who handled transaction stated that such vendee's copurchaser was only person he could recall being mentioned as interested party, and lumber was charged to such vendee alone on sellers' books.

5. Joint adventures 🔑8.

Complaint asserting liability of all defendants in action for price of lumber held sufficient to charge joint liability (Civ. Code, § 1431).

6. Joint adventures 🔑1.

"Joint adventure" is special combination of persons jointly seeking profit in specific adventure, without actual partnership or corporate designation.

> [Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Joint Adventure," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Joint adventures 🔑8.

Parties suing vendors and purchasers as joint obligors for price of lumber used in buildings erected on lots held not required to allege joint adventure.

8. Joint adventures 🔑8.

Proof of joint adventure by defendants held not objectionable as variance from allegations of complaint not alleging joint adventure in action against vendors and purchasers for price of lumber used in buildings erected on lots sold.

9. Joint adventures 🔑8.

Finding of joint adventure by defendants in action against vendors and purchasers for price of lumber used in buildings erected on lots sold held not outside issues, though not alleged.

10. Partnership 🔑11.

Mere arrangement for participation in profits is not conclusive of partnership.

11. Joint adventures 🔑1.

Enterprise evidenced by contract for sale of lots to persons agreeing to erect buildings thereon for resale and divide profits with vendors held "joint adventure."

12. Joint adventures 🔑7.

Joint adventurer, not known to be such by person contracting with coadventurer individually, is not liable to such person, if contracting adventurer exceeded authority.

13. Principal and agent 🔑155(1).

Undisclosed principal is not liable on contracts of one assuming without authority to act for him or contracts made by agent in excess of authority.

14. Joint adventures 🔑8.

Undisputed evidence held to show that purchaser of lots was not authorized to bind vendors personally to pay for lumber used in erection of buildings thereon.

15. Joint adventures 🔑1.

One suffering another to give credit or incur liability on strength of representations, made or permitted by him, that he is joint adventurer, cannot deny such representations thereafter.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County, Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Action by Duff S. Hansen and another, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of the Hansen Lumber Company, against C. O. Burford, Leonard Cole, J. S. Owen, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants Cole and Owen appeal.

Reversed as to appellants.

Superseding opinion in 290 P. 602.

SEAWELL, J.

This cause is before us upon an order of transfer after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Fourth Appellate District, reversing the judgment.

In addition to our independent consideration, we have adopted a portion of the opinion of said District Court of Appeal, by Haines, J., pro tem., as expressing our view on the subject as to the sufficiency of the amended complaint, as well as for the argument and citation of authorities which it contains.

Plaintiffs Duff S. Hansen and Hans Hansen, copartners, doing business under the firm name of Hansen Lumber Company, sued in assumpsit to recover the price of lumber alleged to have been sold by them to defendants. Defendants V. B. Nowling, C. O. Burford, and Edith Burford, his wife, defaulted, but the action went to trial against defendants Leonard Cole and J. S. Owen.

The court gave judgment against all defendants for the sum of $3,116.09, based upon a finding that said defendants were engaged in a joint adventure and the lumber was sold and delivered to them as such joint adventurers. Defendants Cole and Owen appeal from the judgment on the ground that the evidence will not sustain a finding of liability against them on the theory of joint adventure or on any other theory. We are of the view that their contention must be upheld and the judgment reversed.

The evidence shows that Cole and Owen were real estate dealers and the owners of a 10-acre tract in Fontana, San Bernardino county. They approached defendant Nowling with the object of interesting him in the purchase of said tract. As a result of their negotiations, certain written agreements were entered into between Cole and Owen, on the one side, and C. O. Burford and Edith Burford, son-in-law, and daughter, respectively, of Nowling, on the other side. Under said agreements, two lots in said tract, each approximately 124 by 662 feet, were transferred to the Burfords. Nowling was not named as a grantee in the deeds or a party to the agreements, because he was involved by litigation, and, for that reason, might experience difficulty in obtaining loans, but it appears without conflict that he was interested with the Burfords. It was Nowling who negotiated for the purchase of the lumber for which plaintiffs herein seek to recover.

One lot was transferred to the Burfords in September, 1926, and the other in December, 1926. In each case agreements similar in form were executed at about the same time as the deeds. Each agreement recited the sale and transfer of a lot to the Burfords and the execution by them of a deed of trust upon the property to secure the payment of a note for $1,300 given for the purchase price. It was provided therein that the Burfords should, as quickly as could be done, procure a loan for the erection of "a five-room frame house, porch in front and rear, shingle roof, and garage 12′ x 20′, and a chicken unit for 1,000 chickens, 100′ x 20′ in size, paper roof, and all according to the plans and specifications of the Riverside Building and Loan Company," and that they should proceed diligently to construct said buildings. The deed of trust executed by the Burfords to Cole and Owen to secure the payment of $1,300 in each case was not to be placed of record until after the mortgage given to secure the building loan. No cash payment was made upon either of said lots.

The agreements further provided that, when the buildings were completed, the property should be sold to the best advantage, subject to the mortgage executed to a building and loan company as a first lien, and said trust deed as a second lien, and the profits from such resale should be equally divided between the first parties (Cole and Owen) and the second parties (the Burfords). Although the agreement did not so provide, it was understood that Nowling should share equally with the Burfords in the half of the profits to which they should be entitled. By a later provision the parties agreed to use their best efforts to sell the property, but the agreements contained no provision which made the right of Cole and Owen to participate in the profits conditional upon the sale being made to a purchaser procured by them.

Each agreement contained among its concluding provisions the following: "This contract shall not be deemed, held or construed anywhere as creating a copartnership between any of the parties to it, and shall be held to be merely the convenient means for recompensing each party for his share or interest in the property, there being no other practicable mode of division known to them at this time."

The construction of the buildings provided for was superintended by Nowling. He purchased the lumber for which plaintiffs here seek to recover the purchase price, and said lumber was charged to his name upon the books of the lumber company. It would appear that all parties believed that loans could be obtained upon each parcel sufficient to cover entirely the costs of construction, and the agreements were drawn with such a situation in contemplation. Smaller loans were obtainable than had been anticipated, and plaintiffs' lumber bill for more than $3,000 remained unpaid, except for certain trifling sums. Upon the refusal of their demands for payment, plaintiffs brought this action.

During the course of construction, $500 was obtained from Cole upon the representation, according to the testimony of Cole and Owen, that such a sum would complete payment of construction bills. The Burfords gave Cole their note for said sum. The second house was completed in April, 1927. According to Owen, Nowling refused to permit him and Cole to sell the houses, but gave a listing to another agent. Cole testified that the houses were later sold under the deeds of trust and purchased by plaintiffs.

[1] Nowling testified that he informed the lumber company that bills would be paid from the proceeds of loans upon the property, and also that his son-in-law, Burford, and Cole and Owen were interested with him. Plaintiff Duff Hansen testified that Nowling had stated that the price of the lumber would be paid from loans, and that others were interested with him, but he recalled only Nowling's son-in-law as having been mentioned as a party interested. Upon one occasion Cole and Owen drove Nowling to plaintiffs' lumber yard, but they did not participate in the discussion. By the terms of said agreements, it was made the obligation of the Burfords to obtain loans and proceed with the erection of the buildings on lots to which they held title, and in which the only interest of Cole and Owen was as beneficiaries under deeds of trust given to secure the price paid for the lots. It follows from a consideration of the agreements as a whole, as well as from the specific provision that they should not be interpreted as creating a partnership, that the construction of said buildings was a matter under the control and management of the Burfords and Nowling as independent contractors. The fact that Cole and Owen made visits to the property during the course of construction does not alter the relationship between the parties. They would naturally be interested in the project.

[2] We are further of the view that it is clearly to be implied from said clause negativing the existence of a partnership, and from the agreements considered apart from said clause, that it was the intention of the parties thereto that Cole and Owen should not be liable for any bills incurred for labor or materials in the construction of the buildings. A right to participate in profits does not, in the circumstances of this case, imply a liability for losses and expenses. Not only did Cole and Owen fail to assume liability for construction costs, but it is fairly inferable from the agreements that it was the obligation of the Burfords and Nowling to keep the construction costs within the amount to be realized from building loans upon each lot. There is no evidence that the agreements were subsequently modified. Nor is there evidence that Cole and Owen had any knowledge that a situation was arising in which practically the entire lumber bill for more than $3,000, representing one of the larger items in the construction costs, would be unpaid.

[3] The right of Cole and Owen to participate in the profits upon a resale cannot be viewed as a right to a real estate agent's commission, for the reason that payment to them is not made dependent upon their procuring the purchaser. Rather we are of the opinion that the right given Cole and Owen to share in the profits of a resale was a portion of the price charged by them to the Burfords for the two lots. They received no cash payments for said lots, and stipulated for the right to participate in the profits of a sale, in addition to receiving the notes for $1,300. To adopt any other construction would be to make for the parties a contract contrary to their intention, as revealed in the instruments.

The cases of Leake v. City of Venice, 50 Cal. App. 462, 195 P. 440; Burks v. Weast, 67 Cal. App. 745, 228 P. 541; and Locke v. Duchesnay, 84 Cal. App. 448, 258 P. 418, strongly relied upon by respondents, differ too widely from the facts of the instant case to be authority for their contention.

[4] We find no circumstances in the purchase of the lumber by Nowling which would preclude us from giving effect to the actual agreement between the parties and require us to hold that Cole and Owen are liable on the theory that they permitted themselves to be held out to the plaintiffs as partners or jointly liable with Nowling and the Burfords, and plaintiffs sold the lumber in reliance upon said liability. Although Nowling testified that he told plaintiffs Cole and Owen were interested with him, plaintiff Duff Hansen, who handled the transaction, said that Nowling's son-in-law was the only person he could recall as having been mentioned as a party interested. Upon the books of plaintiffs the lumber was charged to Nowling alone. The evidence falls far short of establishing a basis for liability on such theory.

The District Court of Appeal, in its opinion as to the sufficiency of the pleadings and as to substantive matters, said:

"The court also found, inter alia: 'That at said time' (i. e., when the lumber was delivered) 'defendants, as shown by plaintiffs' exhibit No. 2, and defendants' exhibit No. "A" herein' (these being the two contracts) 'were engaged upon a joint adventure and that the title to said premises was delivered and transferred to defendants C. O. Burford and Edith Burford in compliance with said contract of joint adventure and that said goods, wares and merchandise were delivered to defendants as such joint adventurers.'

"It is claimed on behalf of the appellants that what is alleged is a book account, but that the evidence shows none except as against Nowling; that, inasmuch as the complaint does not set up any partnership or joint adventure between the defendants, evidence of such a relation was inadmissible, and that the finding that such a relation existed is outside the issues and cannot, therefore, be relied on to support the judgment; that the evidence is wholly insufficient to justify the finding that the appellants were engaged with the other defendants in a joint adventure, or that the appellants in any wise authorized the purchase of the lumber on their account, or agreed to pay for it; that the trial court should have granted them a nonsuit at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' evidence; and that, as against them, the judgment cannot be supported.

[5] "1. Appellants, as we saw, assert that, according to the pleadings, the account sued on is a book account to which they are strangers, since the proofs show that the only person charged on the plaintiffs' books was Nowling. The distinction, as a matter of pleading, between a book account and an ordinary contract debt not founded on a writing, is only important when, as in Wright v. Loaiza, 177 Cal. 605, 171 P. 311, the statute of limitations is involved and where the question arises whether suit may be commenced within four years, or must be begun within two years after the cause of action has accrued. In the present case, all the transactions were had within two years before the complaint was filed. In these circumstances the distinction between pleading a book account and pleading an indebtedness generally seems to us inconsequential.

"2. Appellants, quoting from 20 California Jurisprudence, 757, urge that: 'There is a material variance between a complaint against an individual for what is pleaded as an individual debt, and proof that the debt is that of a partnership of which he is a member'—citing Miner v. Rickey, 5 Cal. App. 451, 90 P. 718.

"While, therefore, as they say, they 'do not question the propriety of the common counts in the ordinary action against a debtor or joint debtors,' they 'do deny their sufficiency to hold the appellants as joint adventurers.'

"The situation in Miner v. Rickey was that an action was brought by the plaintiff Miner against Rickey alone, as the court said, at page 453 of 5 Cal. App., 90 P. 718, 719: 'Upon the theory that plaintiff was employed by and rendered services for the defendant (Rickey) individually. The defendant relied simply upon the denials in his answer of the material allegations of the complaint. * * * Defendant's evidence * * * tended to prove that whatever liability existed in favor of plaintiff was against a partnership of which the defendant' and another 'were the members.' The court went on to say that 'in this state it has been held that, when "several persons contract together with the same party for one and the same act, they shall be regarded as jointly and not individually or separately liable in the absence of any words to show that a distinct as well as entire liability was intended to fasten upon the promissors. Especially is this the rule as to the legal liability of partners upon their partnership obligations." '

"The language quoted by the court is taken, in substance, from Harrison v. McCormick, 69 Cal. 616, 620, 621, 11 P. 456, 458, where the Supreme Court, after making use of it, and citing sections 1430 and 1431 of the Civil Code as well as section 2442 of that Code and certain cases, goes on to say:

"'It is also well settled that parties to a joint contract must all be made defendants. "Of the parties to the action," the Code says, "those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants." Section 382, Code Civil Proc. The plaintiff had the right to bring his action on the joint obligation of the parties to the contract against all the parties, or against the firm name by which they collectively contracted with him.'

"It is manifest that these cases lend no support to appellants' thesis. The liability asserted in the amended complaint is set up as the obligation, not of one person, as in Miner v. Rickey, but according to the pleading of several persons—that is, all the defendants—and therefore presumptively joint. Civ. Code, § 1431. The pleading is accordingly sufficient to charge that the liability is joint, and, as to that matter, no more would be affected had it been charged in terms that the defendants were joint adventurers. In Pike v. Zadig, 171 Cal. 273, 277, 152 P. 923, 925, following 15 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 920 and cases there cited, it was held that:

"'In an action against partners upon a partnership obligation, it is not necessary to allege a partnership between the defendants, but they may be declared against as any joint debtors.'

"The court added:

"'Indeed, a denial of the partnership, where it is alleged, does not raise a material issue'—citing Hunter v. Martin, 57 Cal. 365, where it is said: 'If they enter into that agreement, their liability did not depend upon their being partners.'

"Pike v. Zadig was followed by Shannon v. Calmus, 70 Cal. App. 652, 655, 234 P. 107, to the same effect.

[6] "A joint adventure has been defined as:

"'A special combination of two or more persons where in some specific adventure a profit is jointly sought, without any actual partnership or corporate designation.' 33 C. J. 841.

[7-9] "If, then, in suing partners on an obligation contracted by them as such, it is not necessary to allege the existence of the partnership, it would seem that the rule must apply a fortiori when the action is against joint adventurers, since a joint adventure is the looser form of association. We are therefore of the opinion that it was unnecessary for the plaintiffs, even though they claimed that the obligation of the defendants was that of joint adventurers, to allege the fact of the joint adventure. Proof of it, or that the obligation was incurred in the course of it, was not objectionable as a variance from the allegations of the complaint, and evidence of that relationship, in so far as it was a logical step in the plaintiffs' effort to prove, as against the defendants, what they had alleged as a joint obligation, was within the issues and properly admitted. Neither is the finding on the subject outside the issues, but it amounts really to the finding of a probative, rather than an ultimate, fact within the issues, and is, strictly speaking, unnecessary; the ultimate fact alleged and covered by another finding being the participation of all of the defendants jointly in the purchase of the lumber and their joint agreement, whether express or implied, to pay for it.

"In Leake v. City of Venice, 50 Cal. App. 462, 195 P. 440, 441, involving a voluntary unincorporated association engaged in promoting a racing enterprise, it was said that, 'conceding the association did not, as to the members thereof constitute a partnership in the full and generally accepted sense, nevertheless it appears that defendants were engaged in a joint venture in the nature of a partnership, to which the same rules for enforcing liability for debts incurred apply'—citing Ash v. Guie, 97 Pa. 493, 39 Am. Rep. 818.

"See, to the same point, Stitzinger v. Truitt, 81 Cal. App. 502, 506, 253 P. 971; Nowell v. Oswald, 96 Cal. App. 536, 537, 274 P. 423; Old River Farms Co. v. Roscoe Haegelin Co., 98 Cal. App. 331, 335, 276 P. 1047.

"The Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Henshaw, said in Westcott v. Gilman, 170 Cal. 562, 569, 150 P. 777, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 437:

" 'The all-important difference in construing partnership and relationships of this kind as between the parties themselves upon the one hand, and as between the parties themselves and those who have dealt with them upon the other hand, is this: That as between the parties themselves, when the rights of no third persons are involved, the question is one of determination merely upon the letter of the contract and the conduct of the contracting parties to each other under it. When, however, the rights of third parties are involved, the basis of the inquiry shifts materially, and the fundamental question is, What had those third parties the right to believe from the language of the contract and from the conduct of the parties to it as affecting them? and not as affecting each other.'

[12] "It is, as we think correctly, laid down in 33 C. J. 872, title, 'Joint Adventurers,' that 'one who is a member of a joint adventure but who is not known to be such at the time by a third person who enters into a contract with another member individually is not rendered liable to such third person for services rendered under such contract, or for damages for the breach thereof, by the fact that the contract relates to the business of the joint adventure, if the contracting member in making such contract exceeded his authority and had no power to bind his associates thereby.'

[13] "That, indeed, follows from the like rule of the general law of agency thus stated in the same work (2 C. J. 842):

" 'In the absence of estoppel or ratification an undisclosed principal is not liable on the contracts of one assuming without authority to act for him, or on contracts made by his agent in excess of his authority or not in the course of his employment.' Harder v. Continental Printing Co., 64 Misc. Rep. 89, 117 N. Y. S. 1001.

[14] "If there is one thing undisputed upon the testimony, taken as a whole, it is that, though the enterprise was in some sort a joint one, and, though there is in the testimony of Nowling and Burford much loose talk, largely in the nature of conclusions of the witnesses, about what Nowling was authorized to do, it was clearly understood by all the associates that all the material bills were to be paid from the mortgage loans, and that they all understood the writings to negative any idea that appellants should be holden for them.

"We think it clear from the record that Nowling had no actual authority from the appellants to bind them to any personal liability for lumber bills. As between the parties, their arrangements will be given effect.

[15] "If, then, there is any basis for the trial court's finding that appellants participated in ordering from the plaintiffs the merchandise mentioned in the complaint and agreeing to pay for it, it must rest on some apparent authority to Nowling to represent appellants in so doing. While appellants admit having originally gone with Nowling when he first talked to the Hansens, and while one of the Hansens, who so far as appears is the only one with whom Nowling talked, as we saw, testified that Nowling, in negotiating with him, said that there were 'others' interested, and while Nowling says that in such negotiations he specified Cole and Owen as responsible men interested with him, yet, as Hansen testifies that he did not even recollect that Nowling had mentioned appellants by name, it is clear that in furnishing the lumber the plaintiffs could have placed no particular reliance on appellants' association with Nowling, or on appellants' responsibility. They may have understood generally that there was a group of persons involved, though no group name was used and no individuals were apparently considered by them, other than Nowling and Burford, whose names alone seem to have made any impression on them. It seems clear that this evidence is too tenuous to support any claim of estoppel, or any theory that the plaintiff is entitled to recover as against the appellants by reason of reliance by the latter on any ostensible agency. It was said in Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 609, 614, 55 P. 425, 427, with respect to an ostensible partnership, and it may be said by analogy with respect to an ostensible agency claimed to result from a joint enterprise, that 'the rule of responsibility and liability declared in section 2444 of the Civil Code is founded upon the equitable principle of estoppel. One who has suffered another to give credit or incur a liability upon the strength of his representations, made or permitted, that he is in fact a partner, will not thereafter be allowed to deny those representations. But, as is declared in the succeeding section of the Code (2445), no one is liable as a partner who is not such in fact, excepting as provided in section 2444.'

"It is apparent from the testimony of Mr. Hansen that credit was not given to Nowling by reason of his statement, if he made any, of the relation of the appellants to the enterprise.

"In these circumstances the finding of the trial court, in so far as it determines that the appellants participated in the purchase of the goods, wares, and merchandise from the plaintiffs and in the agreement to pay for the same, is, it seems to us, without any substantial support in the evidence."

Respondents did not, by their own admission, part with their goods on the faith of payment by the appellants. We may also add that the equities of the transaction, so far as all the parties are concerned, are not known to us.

The judgment, as it respects Cole and Owen, is reversed.

NELSON v. LAKE HEMET WATER CO.

McDOWELL et al. v. SAME.

L. A. 8305.

Supreme Court of California.
March 30, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 27, 1931.

1. Judgment ⚷668(1).

Supreme Court's judgment annulling commission's order and holding that irrigation corporation was not public utility and was liable on water certificates held res adjudicata even as to nonappealing certificate holders.

> It appeared that corporation in question sold several hundred tracts of land, together with perpetual water rights evidenced by water certificates; that Railroad Commission held that corporation was public utility, and was entitled to increase its rates; that only part of protesting certificate holders who had appeared before commission sought review by Supreme Court, which annulled order of commission, and held that corporation was not public utility, and that commission had no jurisdiction over it; and that corporation then took attitude that Supreme Court's judgment was binding only on those certificate holders who had sought review of commission's order.

2. Judgment ⚷713(2).

Questions and proof which could have been presented before judgment are conclusively deemed to have been presented.

3. Waters and water courses ⚷257(1).

Payments of increased rates by orchardists dependent on irrigation, being compulsory, held not abandonment of right to enforce contract rates.

In Bank.

Appeals from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Separate actions by John G. Nelson and by Edgar E. McDowell and others against the Lake Hemet Water Company, the actions being tried together. From an adverse judgment in each case, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; SHENK, J., dissenting.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry Goodcell, of San Bernardino, and W. G. Irving and Fred L. Hamblin, both of Riverside, for respondents.

PRESTON, J.

We have been led to a conclusion on a simple question of law which disposes of the appeals in both of the above causes, which were tried together, and renders superfluous a discussion of the various other questions so ably urged by appellant. This conclusion is that the respective rights of the parties to this litigation have been previously determined and settled by a judgment of this court; hence the doctrine of res adjudicata has thereby intervened. We refer, to the case of Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 68, 175 P. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249, hereinafter called the Allen Case for convenience. Reference is made to said case for a complete history of defendant corporation, its manner of doing business, together with a description of the rights and claims of Allen and others, all of whom, including respondents, were in an identical situation; therefore only a brief recital of the facts is required.

Appellant and an allied corporation acquired ownership of a large area of agricultural lands along the San Jacinto river in Riverside county, together with a water supply from said river and its tributaries. Between the years 1889 and 1915 it subdivided said lands and sold them in small areas, selling likewise with each tract a perpetual water right appurtenant thereto, evidenced by a contract in the form of so-called water certificates, which provided for one-eighth of a miner's inch of water per acre for each of said tracts during the irrigation season at an annual rate of $2 per acre. Several hundred of these tracts were sold and a corresponding number of water certificates were issued. In the course of time, the weight of these contracts at so low a figure bore heavily upon the corporation. Accordingly, in 1915 it came before the Railroad Commission and petitioned, alleging itself a public utility with respect to the service to the owners of these water certificates, and praying to be allowed to abrogate said contracts and that each holder be required to pay an increased charge for his water supply. The commission entertained the petition; presumably all the legal steps, such as notice and publication, were duly taken, and the parties were brought before the commission regularly for the hearing. The hearing was held, evidence taken, and the proceeding resulted in an order of the commission, made in 1916, granting the prayer of the petitioner and declaring it a public utility, and attempting to increase the water rate of each holder from $2 to $3, directing a compliance therewith. Respondents themselves or their predecessors in interest were thus legally before the commission as parties in the matter of this hearing.

Following this order of the commission, a rehearing was denied, and thereafter petition was made to this court by some of the certificate holders only for a review and annulment of the order. Other of the certificate holders in like situation, for reasons which we can only surmise, did not become actual parties by name to the proceedings in this court. Respondents and their predecessors were of this latter class. Said proceedings terminated in the order and judgment in the Allen Case, above cited.

This court held that the water supply of the corporation had not been dedicated to a public use at the time of the issuance of said water certificates; that the water right vested in the landowner, and was made appurtenant to his private property; that these water rights constituted easements attached to the respective lands, and impressed a corresponding servitude upon the source of supply and distributing system of the corporation; that in the making of said contracts both parties to each thereof acted as of right in their private capacities.

Notwithstanding this holding, appellant immediately took the position that the Railroad Commission order was in full force and effect as to all parties who had not actually participated in the proceeding for review by this court; in other words, only such parties as actually petitioned this court received the benefit of the annulment of said order of the commission by the judgment in the Allen Case. Acting upon this contention, appellant required respondents in this action to pay the increased charge fixed by the commission, which said charge respondents reluctantly paid for a time.

Later, and in the year 1920, another hearing was had before the Railroad Commission, in which still another increased rate was allowed as to certain utility services being rendered by the corporation. Appellant again assumed that this rate was applicable to the respondents, and required that they conform to it; this, too, in the face of the fact that by the order of 1920 the commission expressly declared that it was without jurisdiction to fix the rate to be paid by the certificate holders. In other words, the commission expressly declared the Allen Case to be a test case and to have settled the rights of all the certificate holders and the status of appellant toward them, whether or not they were participants in the special proceedings for review by this court.

The result of this situation was that the two actions now before us were instituted in the year 1920 to compel appellant to respect the water certificates originally issued and to supply respondents with the water called for therein at the rate therein specified. Issue was joined on the complaints; several special defenses were interposed; trials were had, followed by findings of fact, conclusions of law and judgments in full accord with the allegations and prayers of the complaints, from which defendant prosecuted these appeals, each of which is primarily predicated upon the contention that the Allen Case left the order of 1916 in effect as to all the respondents, and as a consequence the Superior Court was without power to overthrow or modify it in this action. It is this contention which we shall now discuss.

[1] After a consideration of the proceedings before the commission and opinion and judgment of this court sitting in review thereof, we are forced to conclude that the fixing of the status of appellant under the utility law was the primary task undertaken by both tribunals. The judgment in question rested solely upon the conclusion that appellant was not a public utility, by reason of which fact the Railroad Commission was without authority or jurisdiction over it. No other important question was before the court.

This fact seems to classify this holding at once as a species of in rem judgment, binding upon appellant and all others who were before the commission and who were in the like situation of petitioners in said Allen Case. Decrees of divorce or annulment, which settle the marital status of persons, decrees establishing residence, sanity, insanity, or heirship, seem analogous, as do also decrees in probate, bankruptcy, or admiralty. It would be illogical, indeed, to hold that appellant was not a public utility in its relationship with a vast number of the certificate holders, but that in its relationship with some others it was a public utility, administering a public service; in other words, to charge certain holders of certificates of appellant of like issue, purpose, and tenor upon a private contract one rate and others upon a contract affected by a public interest at another rate is thoroughly incongruous. The decree of the Railroad Commission of 1916 must therefore be held to have been overthrown entirely by the judgment in the Allen Case, and in so doing appellant was established as and declared to be a private corporation as to the services being rendered the said certificate holders.

The situation must be held to be the same as if the Railroad Commission had decided the issue presented to it differently by holding that the certificate holders contracted with appellant in its private capacity only. No one would say that such a holding would not have bound appellant in its relationship with all said certificate holders. The fact that this adjudication was made by review and annulment of the decree, instead of by affirmance thereof, does not prevent it from being final so long as it is clear that an adjudication of the disputed question was intended.

[2] In this view of the cause, the Allen decree could have been sought by one petitioner alone, and, when secured, it would have been binding upon appellant as to all the class of certificate holders to which he belonged. It is therefore not germane to review the events transpiring prior to this adjudication, as all questions which could have been raised prior to the judgment are conclusively deemed to have been presented, and all proof that could have been presented is conclusively presumed to have been received. Price v. Sixth District, 201 Cal. 502, 258 P. 387.

Likewise it is of no avail to make even a successful assault upon the doctrine of the Allen Case, for it could in no event avail appellant as against respondents, for all rights between appellant and respondents were there finally adjudicated as of that date.

[3] The contention that, by paying the rate prescribed by the Railroad Commission for one or two seasons, respondents acquiesced in the claim of appellant that it was a utility, need receive but little consideration. The court found these payments to have been made under compulsion. Respondents, being orchardists, had to have water, and there was no other supply; appellant refused to respect the contract, and respondents' payments must therefore be considered as compulsory. It is certainly not a situation upon which to predicate the abandonment of a private right of property.

The claim that respondent McDowell's certificates postdated the judgment in the Allen Case is met by the undisputed finding that the certificates held by him were reissues of certificates which antedated the Railroad Commission hearing, and whose holders were, constructively at least, before the commission at said hearing.

We are confirmed in the views we have expressed by the holding of the commission itself that the Allen Case was a test case, and settled the status of appellant as to all certificate holders before the commission, and in accord with this declaration it refused to fix any rates in 1920 between appellant and respondents.

It follows that the judgment in each case is hereby affirmed.

SMALLBERG v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.

L. A. 12466.

Supreme Court of California.
March 30, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 27, 1931.

1. Attorney and client ⚷53(2), 58.

Attorney held guilty of knowingly and intentionally aiding and abetting unlicensed persons to "practice law," justifying one year's suspension.

> The acts of the unlicensed person in interviewing client with view to procuring agreement enabling such unlicensed person to control negotiations and litigation, and in procuring complaints to be drawn, verified, and filed, procuring appointment ex parte of guardian ad litem, and causing process to be issued, all before attorney had ever seen or interviewed parties whom he was supposed to represent and all done with knowledge, consent, and connivance of attorney constituted "practice of law." In a larger sense, "practice of law" includes legal advice of counsel, and preparation of legal instruments and contracts by which legal rights are secured, although such matter may or may not be depending in a court, as well as generally understood meaning of performing services in court.
> [Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Practice of Law," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Attorney and client ⚷53(2).

Attorney held properly found guilty of accepting professional employment as result of activities of unlicensed person who for compensation controlled, directed, and influenced such employment.

3. Attorney and client ⚷38.

Attorney held guilty of willfully violating rules of professional conduct in advising commencement and prosecution of actions without having been consulted by plaintiff.

In Bank.

The Board of Governors of the State Bar of California recommended the suspension of Alfred J. Smallberg as an attorney at law, and he applies for review of such recommendation.

Affirmed.

E. A. Klein and Edward J. Cotter, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

William C. Mathes and Philbrick McCoy, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The petitioner applies to this court for a review of the proceedings had before the State Bar of California in the matter of an accusation presented before the local administrative committee of said body in and for the county of Los Angeles, wherein the petitioner was accused of the violation of certain of the rules of professional conduct adopted by the State Bar of California with the approval of this court, and which are specifically set forth in said accusation. A hearing was had thereon before said committee in the course of which much evidence was presented pro and con at the conclusion of which the committee made and presented to the board of governors of the State Bar certain findings and conclusions, with its recommendation that the petitioner be disbarred. The latter body upon an examination of the record thus presented before it approved certain findings of the committee, but proceeded to make certain other and further findings, and having done so recommended to this court the suspension of the petitioner for the period of one year. The record of the hearing had before the administrative committee and of its findings and recommendation thereon, as well as the findings and recommendation of the board of governors of the State Bar, have been presented to us upon this application and hearing had thereon; we have carefully examined this record and have reached the following conclusions: The facts as presented in this proceeding do not differ materially from those which were presented to and considered by us in the case of Townsend v. State Bar of California, 291 P. 837, recently decided, and the proceedings in Shaw v. State Bar of California, 297 P. 532, in which our decision has just been filed.

The petitioner was on or about August 7, 1929, engaged by one Nathan Balkin to act in his capacity as an attorney and counselor at law and to advise with and cooperate with said Balkin in the matter of the commencement and prosecution of two actions to be brought against one B. H. Morgan to recover damages on behalf of two certain parties named Angelita Mena and Cruz Mena for personal injuries sustained in an automobile accident. Nathan Balkin was at the time and for some time prior thereto had been engaged in the business of soliciting and adjusting personal injury cases under the fictitious name of "General Claims Bureau of Southern California." He was not an attorney and counselor at law, but he claimed the right to engage in said business under and by virtue of a license issued to him under the provisions of section 633e of the Political Code, as added by St. 1925, p. 421. He was, in the terms of modern parlance, an ambulance chaser and was well known by the petitioner herein to have been such at the time of the accident and at the time when he sought to enlist the services of the petitioner as an attorney and counselor at law, and to have obtained in that capacity a contract in writing from the aforesaid two persons much similar in its scope and content to the contracts which were given consideration by this court in the cases of Townsend and Shaw, supra, and as to the substance of which the petitioner herein was fully advised at the time he entered into his engagement with Balkin. Among the provisions of said contract was one by which Balkin was to receive a one-third interest in whatever amounts were recovered in the adjustment of or litigation upon said claims. Balkin was authorized to employ attorneys to assist him in effecting such adjustment or conduct such litigation, with the proviso that all attorney's fees were to be paid out of his share in the outcome. On August 5, 1929, the accident in which the parties were injured occurred. On August 6th the parties injured were interviewed by a clerk of Balkin and their signatures were obtained to said contract. On August 7th relations were established between Balkin and the petitioner herein and on that day the latter was instructed to prepare complaints in two actions to be brought against Ben H. Morgan on behalf of said injured parties. The petitioner prepared the two complaints, attached to each his signature as attorney of record for the plaintiff in each case and delivered the same to Balkin, who took them to Orange county and there procured the verification thereof by Manuel Mena, the husband of Angelita and the father of Cruz. Cruz Mena being a minor, the petitioner also prepared an application for the appointment of Manuel Mena as guardian ad litem for her, which he delivered to Balkin, who attended both to the verification of said complaints and their said petitions and to the appointment of Manuel Mena as guardian ad litem of the minor. He also attended to the filing of the complaints in the superior court of Orange county and to the issuance and service of process thereon. The petitioner did not see or have any communication with Manuel Mena or with either of the parties in said actions until several days after the complaints therein were filed. He then went to the home of Manuel Mena for the first time and in talking with the latter learned that he had in the meantime been advised by friends to consult other attorneys with a view to their substitution for the petitioner in the cases which had theretofore been filed. He thereupon and within the next day or two, of his own motion, caused the two actions to be dismissed without prejudice, but immediately after doing so was served with notice of substitution of other attorneys, who presently came into court and caused the dismissal of said causes to be set aside. Thus ended the petitioner's connection with said cases, but did not end the inquiries of the parties concerned as to the manner in which the connection of the petitioner with the causes had been brought about and the conduct of the same prior to their dismissal. The record in this proceeding may well be said to illustrate the evils of ambulance chasing in their most vicious and aggravated forms. On the day after Manuel Mena and his family were involved in an automobile collision in which several members thereof, including his wife and minor daughter, were seriously injured, Nathan Balkin, who describes his business as that of "Just Personal Injury Claims" and who had been engaged in that business in Los Angeles for a period of five years, operating under the fictitious name of "General Claims Bureau," having learned of said accident through a communicative police officer, went to the home of Manuel Mena at Yorba Linda, a little town in Orange county, together with his "clerk," so called, who conducted the main negotiations with Mena. They took with them the printed forms of four contracts, which they importuned Mena to sign. They exhibited to him the card of the petitioner and stated that he was the attorney who was to be employed to handle the several cases which Balkin was authorized to commence and prosecute under the terms of the contracts. Mena was an ignorant Mexican, speaking the English language indifferently and being barely able to read and write. He was prevailed upon to sign these contracts, although, as he states, he did not read them and they were not read over to him, the contents thereof being stated in general terms. Having obtained his signature the pair hurried back to Los Angeles to the office of this petitioner there, where they laid the facts rather imperfectly before him and directed him to prepare the two complaints and the papers providing for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the minor child. The petitioner prepared these papers and on the following day Balkin and his clerk went to the home of Mena, where the latter was shown the papers and told generally as to their contents, after which he was taken to the office of a notary public in Orange, where he signed the verification to each of said complaints; whereupon the parties went immediately to the courthouse where Balkin's clerk attended to the filing of the complaints and the issuance of the process thereon. He also attended to the service of such process and to the obtaining of such ex parte order as was required for the appointment of Manuel Mena as guardian ad litem of his minor child. All of these details were attended to by Balkin or his clerk before the petitioner had ever seen or held any interviews with any member of the Mena family, and it was only after the petitioner had learned from Balkin or his clerk that the Menas were dissatisfied and were contemplating a change of attorneys that the petitioner held his first interview with the Menas at their home in Yorba Linda, as above stated, immediately after which he of his own motion dismissed said actions.

Shortly thereafter the local administrative committee of the State Bar entered upon the investigation which resulted in the presentation of three separate charges against the petitioner for alleged willful breaches of certain of the rules of professional conduct which had theretofore been adopted by the State Bar. By the first of these the petitioner was charged with having aided and abetted an unlicensed person or persons to practice law in connection with the claim of Angelita Mena and Manuel Mena against Ben H. Morgan. By the second accusation it was charged that the petitioner had on or about August 8, 1929, accepted professional employment in the aforesaid cases as a result of the activities of an unlicensed person, to wit: Nathan Balkin or General Claims Bureau of Southern California, who for compensation controlled, directed, and influenced such employment. Each of the foregoing allegations were alleged to constitute a willful breach of rule 3 of the rules of professional conduct of the State Bar of California. By the third of said accusations the petitioner was charged with having advised the commencement and prosecution of the two actions above referred to without having been consulted by the plaintiffs therein with reference thereto, and which was alleged to constitute a willful breach of rule 10 of the rules of professional conduct of the State Bar of California. At a later stage in the proceeding the further accusation was added to the effect that the petitioner had also violated the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

After a quite full hearing upon the foregoing charges before the local administrative committee that body made findings thereon setting forth substantially and in detail the facts above recited, and as its conclusion thereon it decided as to the first of said charges that it was not true that the petitioner had aided or abetted an unlicensed person to engage in the practice of the law. This conclusion, however, the board of governors of the State Bar, upon the submission of the record upon said hearing, refused to adopt, but on the contrary expressly found and concluded that in said cases and in approximately ten other cases similarly initiated and handled by the accused he had knowingly and intentionally aided and abetted unlicensed persons to practice law. As to the other charges the board of governors approved the findings and conclusions of the administrative committee, confining its recommendation, however, to the suspension of the petitioner from the practice of the law for the period of one year.

[1-3] Upon the examination of the entire record herein we are satisfied that the board of bar governors was correct in its conclusion to the effect that the petitioner, with relation to the cases above referred to was guilty of having knowingly and intentionally aided and abetted an unlicensed person or persons to practice law as that term was defined by this court in the recent case of State Bar of California v. Superior Court, 207 Cal. 323, 278 P. 432, wherein this court adopted the definition of that term contained in the case of Eley v. Miller, 7 Ind. App. 529, 34 N. E. 836, 837, to wit: "As the term is generally understood, the 'practice' of the law is the doing or performing services in a court of justice, in any matter depending therein, throughout its various stages, and in conformity to the adopted rules of procedure. But in a larger sense it includes legal advice and counsel, and the preparation of legal instruments and contracts by which legal rights are secured, although such matter may or may not be depending in a court." In the case of People v. Merchants' Protective Corp., 189 Cal. 531, 535, 209 P. 363, 365, this court gave extended consideration to the question as to what was embraced within the term, "practice of the law," in the course of which it held that, "counsel and advice, the drawing of agreements, the organization of corporations and preparing papers connected therewith, the drafting of legal documents of all kinds, including wills, are activities which have long been classed as law practice. The Legislature is presumed to have used the words as persons generally would understand them, and not being technical or scientific terms 'to practice as an attorney at law' means to do the work, as a business, which is commonly and usually done by lawyers here in this county. [Citing numerous cases.]"

In the instant matter the record sufficiently shows that a number of acts were done and performed by Nathan Balkin and his clerk which were clearly within the foregoing category, such as the interviewing of Manuel Mena with a view to the procurement of such written agreements as would enable Balkin, an unlicensed person, to control the conduct of whatever negotiations or litigation might ensue with respect to the aforesaid claims for damages for personal injuries to the several members of his family, including the right to make settlements, employ attorneys, physicians, and to "institute any proceedings in my behalf that you may see fit to effect a recovery." Pursuant to such employment Balkin procured the complaints to be drawn by the petitioner and proceeded to have the same verified and filed, procured the appointment ex parte of a guardian ad litem, to cause the process to be issued upon the filing of said complaints, and to proceed to make service of the same, all before the petitioner herein had ever seen or interviewed the parties whom he was supposed to represent as attorney of record in said cases. In other words, every essential step in the procurement of said business, in the ascertainment of the facts which were to form the basis of whatever complaints were to be prepared and filed, the presentation of such complaints to the parties who were supposed to verify and who did in fact verify the same, the procurement of the notary to take and certify to such verification, the presentation for filing of the complaints when thus verified, and the issuance and service of the process thereon—all of these things were done by Balkin or his clerk with the knowledge, consent, and connivance of the petitioner herein. We are of the opinion that the aforesaid succession of acts in connection with the cases of Angelita Mena and Cruz Mena v. Ben H. Morgan constituted the practice of the law as that term has been defined in the foregoing decisions of this court, and this being so we are constrained to hold that the petitioner was properly found guilty of having willfully aided and abetted an unlicensed person or persons to practice law, contrary to the provisions and inhibition of rule 3 of the rules of professional conduct adopted by the State Bar. We are also satisfied that the petitioner was properly found guilty of a further violation of the provisions of said rule through his acceptance of professional employment on behalf of the plaintiffs in the two personal injury cases above referred to and which professional employment was offered to him as a result of the activities of an unlicensed person or persons who for compensation controlled, directed and influenced such employment. We are further satisfied that the petitioner was properly found guilty of a willful violation of the provisions of rule 10 of the rules of professional conduct of the State Bar in that he advised the commencement and prosecution of the two actions above referred to without having been consulted in reference thereto by the plaintiff in either of said actions when, as shown by the record herein, he should have come into such relation of personal contact with the plaintiffs to said actions or with some one other than an ambulance chaser, authorized to represent them, as would have caused the relation of attorney of record of the aforesaid plaintiffs to properly and legitimately be created. As to the alleged violation by the petitioner of the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we make no finding and are required to make none, since the aforesaid findings and conclusions of the board of governors of the State Bar are sufficient to fully justify the recommendation of that body that the petitioner should be suspended from the practice of the law for the period of one year.

It is therefore ordered that the petitioner shall be and he is hereby suspended from the practice of the law within the state of California for the period of one year.

Winterer, Combs & Ritchie and McComb & Hall, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Adams & Peck, E. C. Peck, Francis D. Adams, and W. J. McNichols, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the trial court in an action brought by a tenant against his landlord for damages alleged to have been suffered by reason of the breach, by the landlord, of the covenant of quiet enjoyment, and by reason of the eviction by the landlord of the tenant from a portion of the leased premises. The case was tried before the court without a jury, resulting in a verdict in plaintiff's favor in the sum of $2,700. From this judgment, defendant John O. Haley appeals; the action having been dismissed as to all other defendants. Respondent on this appeal has not seen fit to aid this court with any briefs, nor did he respond to an order to show cause.

The facts out of which this controversy arose, and most of which were found by the trial court, are as follows:

[1] On September 28, 1920, defendant Haley and Adelaide Corbley, as lessors, leased to T. C. Larter and associates for the period of two years certain real property located at the southwest corner of Sunset boulevard and McCadden place, in the city of Los Angeles. It appears that at that time defendant owned or controlled three lots, designated as lots 1, 2, and 3, at that corner. It is admitted that the lease in question was of a certain portion of lot 1, then unimproved. The exact portion of lot 1 that was so leased was one of the main questions presented to the trial court. Both parties had lost their copies of the lease, so that its contents had to be proved by parol. On the question of the extent of the lease, it is admitted that it was contemplated by the parties that Larter was to build a real estate office on the premises leased and use and occupy the same for real estate purposes. Defendant contends that all that was leased was the property actually covered by this building, and an entrance thereto. The plaintiff, who is the assignee of Larter and associates, contends, and the trial court found, that there was leased at this time a rectangular strip 52.81 feet by 60 feet, for the purpose of conducting a real estate office thereon. This finding, although based on conflicting evidence, is amply supported by the record.

After taking possession of the property, Larter erected a real estate office thereon and proceeded to grade and plant in lawn the portion of the premises here in dispute. In addition, Larter erected, with materials furnished by defendant, a decorative fence in back of the office, on the line where he deemed the southerly boundary of the leased premises to be. There can be no doubt that these acts were all done with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the landlord, and that all of the premises so graded and planted, and bounded by the fence, were treated by the parties thereto as included within the lease. The portion of the premises immediately east and west of the office, and which had been graded and planted in lawn by Larter, was used by Larter and his assignees for advertising purposes.

Near the expiration date of this lease, defendant Haley, at the request of Larter, extended the term thereof until September 28, 1924. On October 1, 1922, Larter and his associates sold to plaintiff their interest, both in the real estate office and in the lease. Plaintiff immediately took possession, with the express approval and consent of defendant, and paid all installments of rent as they fell due, all of which were accepted by defendant.

It then appears that in December of 1922, defendant leased to one R. F. Meyers all of lots 1, 2, and 3 above mentioned, save that portion occupied by plaintiff. The defendant and Meyers then attempted to induce plaintiff to vacate the premises occupied by him, but he refused so to do. In November of 1923, after these negotiations had failed, Meyers, with the consent and approval of defendant, entered upon the property leased by plaintiff east of the real estate office and erected thereon a building, flush with the sidewalk. The west wall of this building was within 18 inches of the east wall of the plaintiff's office, and effectually blocked light and air from that side. On January 17, 1924, Meyers, again with the consent and approval of defendant, entered upon the property leased by the plaintiff, west of the real estate office, and erected thereon a building flush with the sidewalk. The east wall of this building was within 18 inches of the west wall of plaintiff's office, and effectually blocked light and air from that quarter. Not content with these acts in violation of plaintiff's rights, on January 22, 1924, Meyers again entered upon plaintiff's premises, and with the consent and approval of defendant dismantled the decorative fence in the back and to the south of the real estate office, and erected a fence 9½ feet high within 18 inches of the south wall of the office. By these acts of Meyers, acting with the consent and approval of defendant, not only was plaintiff deprived of portions of the leased property used by him for advertising purposes, but his office was so boxed in that it was no longer visible, except from directly in front. It likewise appears that the advertising boards of plaintiff were torn down and certain electric light standards used to illuminate the office at night were removed.

[2] We have no hesitancy in holding that the findings in reference to the eviction, deprivation of light and air, and breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment are amply supported by the record.

The trial court, however, failed to make any findings at all as to damages suffered by reason of these acts, but simply rendered judgment against defendant in the sum of $2,700. The theory upon which the trial court proceeded is not clear. The trial court, after making findings as to the facts in reference to the eviction, stated, "as a conclusion of law from the foregoing findings of fact, the court finds that the plaintiff, George F. James, is entitled to judgment against the defendant John O. Haley in the sum of twenty-seven hundred ($2,700.00) dollars and for his costs, and that judgment be entered accordingly." No findings as to special or general damage were made at all. Assuming that the above-quoted conclusion could be treated as a finding of fact, it would not be a sufficient finding upon the issues presented by the pleadings. The plaintiff pleaded that he had been damaged in four particulars:

(1) That he had been deprived of advertising space formerly enjoyed by him, to his damage in the sum of $500 a month.

(2) That he had expended on additional billboards the sum of $500.

(3) That, by reason of the fact that he has been cut off from the view of the public and his office rendered dark and insanitary, he has lost patronage, to his financial damage in the sum of $25,000.

(4) That, by reason of being excluded from three-quarters of his leased premises, he has been injured in the sum of $500 a month.

[3-5] Each allegation as to damage was specifically denied by defendant, so that an issue was formed in reference to each of these allegations. It is of course clear that, when a tenant is wholly or partially evicted by the acts of his landlord, he may recover any damages that he may suffer as a result of the eviction. Hamer v. Ellis, 40 Cal. App. 57, 180 P. 30. It is also clear, however, that, when a plaintiff pleads special damage, which is denied by defendant, and offers evidence to support it, that issue becomes a material one on which the losing party is entitled to a finding. Here the findings are entirely silent as to each and every issue raised in reference to damage. Ever since the adoption of the Codes, it has been the rule that findings are required on all material issues raised by the pleadings and evidence, unless they are waived, and, if the court renders judgment without making findings on all material issues, the case must be reversed. 24 Cal. Jur., p. 935, § 183, and p. 940, § 186.

In Klein v. Milne, 198 Cal. 71, at page 76, 243 P. 420, 422, this court, in discussing a similar situation, stated: "The denials of the cross-defendants specifically put in issue these averments as to both the special and the general damages sustained by the cross-complainant Hovis. The findings of the trial court upon the issues thus presented are general and to the effect that Hovis was damaged to the extent of $786.50. We think the trial court was in error in thus making a general finding upon the foregoing separate and specially averred items of damage alleged to have been sustained by the cross-complainant Hovis. Where a complainant or cross-complainant does not in his pleading rely upon a general averment of damages, but pleads both general and special damages, and particularizes the items wherein each consists, and where the defendants or cross-defendants put these specifically in issue, they are entitled to special findings upon the issues as thus presented in order that they may point out the precise errors of the trial court upon motion for a new trial and upon appeal."

[6] The importance of this rule, as applied to the facts of this case, becomes apparent when the following facts are considered. The complaint is framed on the theory that plaintiff, as an individual, is suing the defendant for damages suffered by himself as an individual, because of the wrongful acts of defendant. At the trial it developed, evidently to the surprise of both counsel, that, although the plaintiff had purchased the building and assignment of the lease as an individual, at all time subsequent to October 1, 1922 (the date plaintiff's assignment took effect), the real estate business, situated on the leased property has been operated as a partnership under the name and style of James Realty Company, consisting of plaintiff and one other individual; the other member of the partnership changing at different intervals. All of the first three items of damage set forth above were not suffered by plaintiff as an individual, but were losses or expenditures suffered or made by the partnership. It is clear that plaintiff as an individual is not entitled to recover in this action for damages suffered by a partnership, and therefore, if the lump sum awarded to plaintiff included any allowance for these items, it would be unsupported by the evidence, and would constitute reversible error. It is true that plaintiff sought to prove at the trial an oral assignment from the other partner to himself of all claims against defendant, but this assignment was neither pleaded by the plaintiff nor a finding in reference thereto made by the trial court.

If it were not for the question in reference to the partnership, we would be inclined to reverse the case only on the question of damages, but with that question interjected into the case, it may appear on a new trial that plaintiff has pursued the wrong remedy, and that the only cause of action that exists is on behalf of the partnership. For that reason, in fairness to all concerned, we feel that the entire case should be retried.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is reversed.

Ray W. Bruce, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank G. Swain, of Whittier, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Upon further consideration of this cause, we conclude and hereby approve all that was said in the opinion filed herein on January 19, 1931, and reported in 295 P. 552, making some modification of the judgment and adding thereto as follows:

[1, 2] Under the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the owner of the premises involved in this action is held to be the principal actor, and the person or persons to whom the premises were leased were at all times acting as agent or agents for the owner, in so far as the lien law of this state is concerned. The second paragraph of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, after providing for liens in favor of persons performing labor upon or furnishing property consumed in mining claims, reads as follows: "And every contractor, subcontractor, superintendent or other person having charge of any mining or work or labor performed in and about such mining claim or claims or real property worked as a mine, either as lessee or under a working bond or contract thereon shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter."

The case of Berentz v. Belmont Oil Mining Co., 148 Cal. 577, 84 P. 47, 113 Am. St. Rep. 308, expressly held that oil locations are brought within the category of mining claims, within the meaning and intent of the paragraph of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, from which we have quoted. The opinion in the Berentz Case, with reference to the application of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, is too long to be quoted, but a reading of that case shows clearly that the premises involved in this action is a mining claim, within the terms of the lien law, and therefore, the premises upon which development work is performed, or structures erected for the purposes of development work, are subject to mechanics' and laborers' and materialmen's liens, and the owner of the premises cannot avoid liability by posting notices. See, also, the case of Arctic Lbr. Co. v. Borden (C. C. A.) 211 F. 50.

Appellant calls our attention to the case of Cortelyou v. Baker, 182 Cal. 168, 187 P. 417, where the court held that the provisions of section 661 of the Civil Code are inapplicable to claims prospected for oil. This may be admitted, but we do not perceive how a reference to sluice boxes and kindred articles has any bearing upon this case. The lease of the premises involved in this action, among other provisions, contains the following: "Together with the exclusive right and privilege to explore for, mine, excavate and obtain oil, asphaltum, petroleum, natural gas, tar, and any and all other hydrocarbon substances and kindred products from, upon, in and under the said premises," etc.—a clear recognition that the premises were to be mined, and mineral products extracted therefrom.

[3] It is further contended that the allegations and proof relative to the claim of De Priest are insufficient, in that the allegation is as to the amount of the contract, and the proof only that the contract was fully completed. However, nothing appearing to the contrary, and no question being really made as to the value of the services performed, the following cases show that such proof is sufficient:

In Wood v. Niemeyer, 185 Cal. 526, 197 P. 795, 799, it is said: "Since the memorandum in question was a memorandum of the agreement of the parties concerning the property to be conveyed, the statements therein contained were some evidence of the value of the personal property transferred"—citing a number of cases. No evidence was introduced by the defendants to contradict or offset these statements.

To the same effect is the case of Sanders v. Austin, 180 Cal. 664, 182 P. 449, 450, where the contract was for a certain sum, the allegation that it had been fully performed, etc., in the absence of contradictory testimony, the contract was held sufficient evidence of value. The court said: "But the testimony being in, it has sufficient probative value in the absence of any counter testimony whatever to sustain the finding of the court." The finding of the court was as to value.

In Union Hollywood W. Co. v. Los Angeles, 184 Cal. 535, 195 P. 55, 56, the court said: "The cost of a thing is evidence of its value, especially where it appears that it is comparatively new and where it has no established market value," etc.—citing a number of cases, including those to which we have referred. See, also, the case of Bringham v. Knox, 127 Cal. 40, 59 P. 198, 199, where it is said: "It is urged that since the contract between Knox and Bowen was void, and since for that reason the plaintiff could claim his lien only for the value of the materials furnished by him, and not for the contract price agreed on with Knox (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183), therefore both the claim of lien and the complaint are insufficient, in failing to allege the value of plaintiff's materials. It was, however, stated in the claim that the agreed price was 18 cents apiece for the ties. This statement was a sufficient showing, prima facie, of their value."

[4] It is further contended by the appellant that the court erred in allowing interest prior to the entry of judgment. This contention is well taken. On the first cause of action, to wit, the claim of the Barr Lumber Company, the court allowed the sum of $240.45 as interest, preceding the day of judgment. On the second cause of action, to wit, the claim of W. E. De Priest, the court allowed the sum of $115.03 as interest, preceding the day of entry of judgment. This was error. American-Hawaiian, etc., Co. v. Butler, 17 Cal. App. 764, and cases cited on page 768, 121 P. 709; Mabrey v. McCormick, 205 Cal. 667, 272 P. 289; Grass v. Rindge Co., 84 Cal. App. 750, 258 P. 673; Macomber v. Bigelow, 123 Cal. 532, 56 P. 449.

It is therefore ordered that the sum of $240.45 be stricken from the amount allowed in the first cause of action, and interest allowed only on $1,463.90 from the date of the entry of judgment.

It is further ordered that $115.03 be stricken from the second cause of action, and interest allowed on the sum of $690 at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of the entry of judgment.

In all other respects the judgment is affirmed. The appellant will be awarded his costs.

PEOPLE v. ROGERS.

Cr. 2029.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

March 17, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 30, 1931.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 16, 1931.

1. Constitutional law ⇨42.

Defendant charged with possessing blackjack could not claim act prohibiting possession denied due process because prohibiting possession of blackjack as curio, where evidence excluded claim of possession as curio (St. 1923, p. 696, § 1, as amended by St. 1925, p. 542).

2. Constitutional law ⇨42.

Defendant, prosecuted for possessing blackjack, could not claim act prohibiting possession was unconstitutional as interfering with federal government's right to regulate commerce between states (St. 1923, p. 696, § 1, as amended by St. 1925, p. 542).

3. Criminal law ⇨406(6).

Admissions to officers by defendant charged with possessing weapon was admissible to show defendant was in possession of weapon, where evidence indicated possession by defendant or another (St. 1923, p. 696, § 1, as amended by St. 1925, p. 542).

4. Criminal law ⇨1169(3).

Erroneous admission of evidence of fact subsequently admitted by defendant's testimony is harmless.

5. Criminal law ⇨200(1).

Record of murder prosecution in which weapon was exhibited was properly excluded to show former jeopardy in prosecution for possessing weapon not included in murder charge (St. 1923, p. 696, § 1, as amended by St. 1925, p. 542).

6. Criminal law ⇨292(1).

Record merely showing pleas of "once in jeopardy" and "not guilty by reason of former acquittal" held insufficient (Pen. Code, § 1017).

Pen. Code, § 1017, provided that plea of former conviction should recite conviction or acquittal of offense charged by judgment of court rendered at named place on certain date, and that plea of once in jeopardy should specify time, place, and court.

7. Witnesses ⇨337(5).

Defendant testifying in own behalf could be questioned concerning conviction for felony to affect credibility, regardless whether appeal was pending.

8. Criminal law ⇨1137(1).

Counsel approving forms of verdict before given to jury could not object to forms on appeal.

9. Criminal law ⇨1172(7).

Instruction more favorable to defendant than it would have been without language objected to could not be complained of by defendant.

10. Criminal law ⇨1144(14).

Where instructions were refused except as covered in instructions given, and complete instructions were not brought up, it will be presumed that other instructions given properly covered same subjects.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. Rey Schauer, Judge.

Glenn A. Rogers was convicted of violating the act prohibiting possession of a blackjack and the like, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Ralph D. Paonessa and Alexander L. Oster, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J.

It is provided by statute that "every person who within the state of California * * * possesses any instrument or weapon of the kind commonly known as a black-jack, slungshot, billy, sand-club, sand-bag or metal knuckles * * * shall be guilty of a felony. * * *" Stats. 1923, pp. 695, 696; Deering's General Laws Supp. 1925–1927, Act No. 1970. The foregoing quotation, which is from section 1 of the act as amended by Statutes 1925, p. 542, specifies certain exceptions of police and other officers from the operation of the act, in relation to the carrying of a wooden club, baton, or other authorized equipment. The defendant, having been convicted of a violation of this act, appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that said section 1 is unconstitutional, in that it provides for deprivation of property without due process of law. He claims that by making mere possession a felony it is attempted to make it unlawful to possess one of the described articles even as part of a collection of curios. He suggests the further point that the section is unconstitutional in so far as it attempts to prohibit the importation of the enumerated weapons into this state, and so constitutes an interference with the right of the federal government to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states. At the trial appellant testified with respect to the blackjack or sap, which he was charged with having in his possession, that he bought it as a curiosity in Colon, Panama, during his time of service in the navy. In his testimony, however, he admitted that on the day of the arrest he had the said blackjack or sap and a gun, together with some articles of clothing, in a traveling bag which he carried from his place of residence in Los Angeles to the house where, on the same day, he was arrested. It appears from other evidence that about midnight on that day, together with one Miss Cooley, he had carried said bag and contents to the home of Miss Cooley where he was arrested later in the day; that at the last-named time and place and in the presence of the defendant and Miss Cooley, the officers opened the bag and found said blackjack or sap in the bag. Miss Cooley testified that she heard one of the police officers say, "Oh, you carry a blackjack around," and that the defendant, who was present there at the time, did not make any reply. From the evidence thus produced showing the circumstances under which the weapon was found in the possession of the defendant, we think that he is not entitled to the benefit of the points presented by him on the constitutionality of the act, although it may be that under other circumstances there might be some merit in these points. A. F. Estabrook Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 767, 177 P. 848. The defendant is not prosecuted for importing the weapon into California. The circumstances under which the weapon was found in his possession are sufficient to exclude the claim of possession as a curio at the time, even if when originally purchased by the defendant he had only intended to keep it as a curio.

[3, 4] Appellant further contends that the verdict of the jury in finding him guilty of possession of a sap is not sustained by the evidence. He claims that there was no evidence, independent of the defendant's admissions, to prove possession, and that therefore the corpus delicti was not established; that, in the absence of proof of the corpus delicti, testimony concerning admissions made to officers was not admissible and could not properly be considered by the jury. In the first place, we think that, by evidence independent of the admissions made to the officers, the corpus delicti was established. The testimony of Miss Cooley had shown the transportation of the weapon from the defendant's house to her own house by the defendant, in company with said witness. The bag and its contents, including said weapon, were therefore in the possession either of the defendant or Miss Cooley or of both of them, and such possession was on its face a violation of the statute. It only remained to determine which one of the two was the actual possessor of the weapon. The admissions made by the defendant to the officers were admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing, as apparently they did, that the possession was that of the defendant and not that of Miss Cooley. Moreover, as we have seen, the defendant in his own testimony admitted that he had the bag at the Cooley residence and that the sap or blackjack was in the bag. Erroneous admission of evidence of a fact subsequently admitted by a defendant's testimony is harmless. People v. Booth, 72 Cal. App. 161, 166, 236 P. 987.

[5, 6] Appellant contends that it was error for the court to rule that the record in the case of People v. Rogers, wherein the defendant was charged with the crime of murder and thereafter acquitted, was not to be admitted in evidence. From further comments of counsel it appears that defendant intended to show that this blackjack or sap had been used as an exhibit in the murder trial, and that defendant expected thereby to establish former jeopardy with respect to the offense constituting the subject of the present action. There was no error in the ruling. It may be noted here that defendant claims that he had before the court in this case not only pleas of "not guilty," but pleas of "not guilty by reason of former acquittal" and "once in jeopardy." It does not appear that the crime of possession of the weapon at the time and place stated in the information herein was or could have been in any way included in the charge of murder for which the defendant had been tried. Moreover, there was no sufficient plea of former acquittal or once in jeopardy. The only pleas shown in the record are found in the minutes of the court as set out in the clerk's transcript as follows: " 'Once in jeopardy;' 'Not guilty by reason of former acquittal;' 'Not guilty.' " Concerning the first two of these pleas it is provided in section 1017 of the Penal Code that every plea must be oral and entered upon the minutes of the court in substantially the following form: "3. If he plead a former conviction or acquittal: 'The defendant pleads that he has already been convicted (or acquitted) of the offense charged, by the judgment of the court of ——— (naming it), rendered at ——— (naming the place), on the ——— day of ———.' 4. If he plead once in jeopardy: 'The defendant pleads that he has been once in jeopardy for the offense charged (specifying the time, place, and court).' " In People v. O'Leary, 77 Cal. 30, 18 P. 856, 857, the pleas actually entered upon the minutes of the court were as follows: "First, defendant pleads not guilty of the offense charged; second, a former acquittal; third, once in jeopardy." The jury found the defendant guilty, but did not find on the issues of former acquittal and once in jeopardy. The Supreme Court held that the pleas entered upon the minutes were insufficient as not complying with section 1017 of the Penal Code. The court said: "The object of these forms is plain. The people should be informed of the circumstances as to time, place, and court." The court held that the pleas not being in the form required by the Code, it was not necessary for the jury to find on them, and the judgment was affirmed. To like effect, see Rebstock v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 308, 315, 80 P. 65.

[7] Appellant claims that it was error for the court to overrule his objection to the following question put to him by the district attorney: "Q. One week ago last Friday you were convicted of the crime of robbery with a gun were you not?" Counsel for defendant objected to this question on the ground that the case referred to was now pending on appeal. A sufficient reply to this objection would be that defendant did not offer any evidence to prove that any appeal was pending. And, even if an appeal was pending, the objection would not have been good. Defendant having offered himself as a witness, the cross-examiner had the right to show that the witness had been convicted of a felony. The question related solely to the defendant as a witness and his credibility as a witness. The defendant having voluntarily testified in his own behalf, it was competent for the prosecution to show, either by his cross-examination or by the record of the judgment, that he had theretofore been convicted of a felony. People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 12, 21, 87 P. 1016. It has been held that a witness may be asked upon cross-examination whether he had been convicted of a felony, where a conviction had been had by the verdict of a jury, but sentence had not yet been pronounced. People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 307, 66 P. 372. Since such evidence of conviction is only for purposes of impeachment and goes only to the matter of credibility of the witness, we see no reason why the mere pendency of an appeal should affect the question of admissibility of the impeaching evidence.

[8] Concerning the contention of appellant that the court erred in submitting to the jury certain modified forms of verdict, with the modifications showing on the face thereof, it is sufficient to say, first, that the items of objection are trivial; and, second, that it is shown in the reporter's transcript that the forms of verdict were submitted to counsel and approved by them before they were given to the jury.

[9, 10] Concerning the specification of error in a certain instruction given to the jury, we find that the language used by the court and criticized by appellant was more favorable to appellant than the instruction would have been without such language. Therefore he has no ground of complaint. Concerning the three refused instructions requested by appellant, it appears upon the face of said instructions that they contained errors that justified the refusal. In addition to this we note that the instructions were "refused except as covered in instructions given." Inasmuch as the complete instructions have not been brought up, it will be presumed that the same subjects of instruction were properly covered by other instructions given by the court.

Due attention has been given to the assignments of misconduct of the district attorney. They appear to be without substantial merit. We think that appellant was given the benefit of a fair trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SCHEINBAUM et al. v. DRIVER et al.

Civ. 6663.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

March 31, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1).

Judgment based upon trial court's version of conflicting evidence will not be disturbed upon appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⚷981.
New trial ⚷104(1).

Question of granting new trial for newly discovered evidence which was merely cumulative lay within trial court's judicial discretion, and its determination was conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by A. M. Scheinbaum and another against E. R. Driver and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendant named appeals.

Appeal from order denying new trial dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Hugh E. Macbeth, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Louis Feinstein, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The defendant E. R. Driver appeals from a judgment based upon a lease of real property, for alleged unpaid rent, and from an order denying a new trial.

[1] The principal contention of appellant is that a successor to the tenancy assumed the obligation upon which the action was founded, but we are not concerned with the veracity of witnesses, and a judgment based upon the trial court's version of conflicting evidence will not be disturbed upon appeal. Badover v. Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank, 186 Cal. 775, 200 P. 638. The lease was received in evidence, bearing the signatures of the defendants, and the plaintiff testified that appellant entered into possession, and did not vacate until the instant suit was commenced; that he did not lease the premises to a third person, nor let such third person into possession at any time.

[2] The only other contention is that the trial court erred in denying a new trial when certain asserted newly discovered evidence was produced. This evidence, however, was merely cumulative as tending to show by affidavits that a third person was in fact occupying the premises at times, but an affidavit of the plaintiff also averred upon information and belief that this party was not a tenant by the plaintiff's consent, and merely was present with the defendants. There is no allegation that such information could not have been elicited at the time of the trial from the same witnesses, nor that the appellant used any diligence to ascertain the facts prior to rendition of the judgment. This question, also, lay within the judicial discretion of the court, and its determination thereof is conclusive.

There being no appeal from an order denying a new trial, the appeal therefrom is dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

This appeal and the appeals in the Estate of Brenhart (Cal. App.) 297 P. 931, and Estate of Slingsby (Cal. App.) 297 P. 931, are presented upon separate records, but upon one set of briefs, pursuant to an order of consolidation. Each appeal is taken from the order and decree settling the final account of the executor and appellant.

We deem it unnecessary to set forth in detail the facts in each case. The essential facts are the same and the identical question is involved in all three cases. The court found in each case that the executor was transacting its business through three departments, to wit, a commercial department, a savings department, and a trust company department, as provided by law; that upon its appointment as executor and from time to time thereafter, the bank deposited money coming into its hands as such executor in the savings bank department of said bank in the name of the estate and of itself as executor of the estate; that in the final account said executor acknowledged as cash received and charged itself with a certain sum as accrued interest on the funds so deposited, said interest being calculated at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum compounded semiannually. It further found and concluded that upon the deposit of said funds the bank did thereupon commingle the funds of the estate with its own, used the funds of the estate in carrying on its own business and made a profit thereon, and did thereby become liable to said estate for interest at the legal rate, to wit, 7 per cent. per annum from the time of deposit up to the date of the final account. The court thereupon approved and settled the account in all particulars except that it allowed interest at the rate of 7 per cent. on said funds and charged the same against the executor in lieu of interest at 4 per cent. compounded semiannually. There is no evidence to indicate that the executor did not in all other respects perform its duties and obligations as required by law. So far as the evidence showed it was proper in each case to deposit the funds of the estate in a savings bank, and it appeared that the interest accounted for was computed at the usual rate of interest allowed by said bank to its depositors and was a fair and reasonable rate. No findings were made to the contrary and there was neither evidence nor findings to the effect that this was not the usual rate of interest paid to depositors in savings banks. No objections or exceptions to the final account, written or otherwise, were made or taken by any persons interested in the estates. In fact, in the Estate of Smith the residuary legatee filed a written approval of the account and requested that it be settled and allowed. In that estate interest was allowed only to the last semiannual payment date and not up to the filing of the account. This was done with the consent of and by agreement with the residuary legatee, who desired the money to remain in the savings bank department until the next interest date. The trial court in each case apparently applied the general rules applicable to the commingling by an executor of trust funds with funds of his own and ordered and decreed that the executor be charged with interest at the increased rate. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1613, 1614; Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 615, 35 P. 345, 639; Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 441, 446, 44 P. 182; Wheeler v. Bolton, 92 Cal. 159, 28 P. 558; Estate of Clark, 53 Cal. 355; Estate of William Stott, 52 Cal. 403; In re Hilliard, 83 Cal. 423, 23 P. 393; Estate of McQueen, 44 Cal. 584.

[1] These appeals are directed solely to those portions of the orders and decrees settling the final accounts relating to the interest charged. Appellant concedes that the foregoing authorities correctly apply the law relating to individuals acting as executors, but takes the position that the rule there laid down is inapplicable to the facts before us on these appeals. The only question involved is whether a bank acting as executor and doing a departmental banking business may, in cases where it is proper to deposit the funds of the estate in a savings bank, deposit said funds in its own savings bank department and pay the usual rate of interest paid to depositors in savings banks. In other words, did the court err in charging the executor with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum solely for the reason that the money had been deposited in its own savings bank department rather than in some other savings bank? Appellant contends that question should be answered in the affirmative, and we are of the opinion that appellant's position must be sustained.

Preliminarily we may state that although we find no cases in this state dealing with the facts here involved, similar questions have been before the courts of other jurisdictions. Herzog v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 148 App. Div. 234, 132 N. Y. S. 1114; In re Demmerle's Will, 130 Misc. Rep. 684, 225 N. Y. S. 190; In re People's Trust Co., 169 App. Div. 699, 155 N. Y. S. 639; In re Moore's Estate, 211 Pa. 348, 60 A. 991; Knagenhjelm v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co., 43 R. I. 559, 114 A. 5; Hayward v. Plant, 98 Conn. 374, 119 A. 341. In the recent case of In re Reed's Estate, 37 Wyo. 107, 259 P. 815, 55 A. L. R. 941, involving an individual executor who had commingled the funds of the estate with those of his own, the court said at page 817 of the opinion in 259 P.: "It has been held that where a bank or trust company is expressly authorized by law to act as executor, administrator, or trustee, it is not compelled to deposit trust money in another institution, and is not responsible for a higher rate of interest, while the money is in its hands, than paid on other deposits in its own institution. [Citing cases.] But aside from such cases, in which the Legislatures of various states have attempted to meet an apparently modern need, and which we need not consider in greater detail, the rule is still inflexible, reiterated again and again by the courts, that a trustee, including an executor, administrator, and guardian, cannot mingle trust money with his own, cannot invest it in his own business, and cannot make a profit from the trust money committed to his care."

Proceeding to a consideration of the legislative enactments of this state, we find that prior to 1913 a departmental bank acting as trustee or executor could not deposit trust funds in its savings bank department and the general rule prohibiting a trustee or executor from mingling trust funds with his own was applicable to such departmental banks. Bank Act, Stats. 1909, chap. 76. Section 25 provided: "No department shall receive deposits of any other department of the same corporation." And section 32 provided: "Any bank receiving trust funds in accordance with the provisions of this act relating to trust companies must not mingle such trust funds with the other assets of the corporation." However, in 1913 (St. 1913, chap. 104), section 25 was amended to provide an exception as follows: "except that a trust department may make deposits of trust or any other funds under its control with the commercial or savings department of the same corporation." And section 32, prohibiting the mingling of funds, was amended (St. 1913, p. 155) by adding the words "except as otherwise provided in section twenty-five of this act." Again, in 1915 (St. 1915, chap. 608), the exception in section 25 was amended to read "except that a trust department, in proper cases, may make deposits of trust or any other funds under its control with the savings department of the same corporation and may, upon order, previously obtained, of any court having jurisdiction of any trust or fund, make deposits of moneys belonging thereto with the commercial department of the same corporation." Further change in section 25 was made in 1921 (St. 1921, chap. 780), when the exception was amended to read, "except that a trust department, in proper cases, may make deposits of trust or any other funds under its control with the savings department or the commercial department of the same corporation."

[2-5] In our opinion section 25, as amended in 1921, clearly permits the trust department of a bank in proper cases to deposit the funds of an estate for which it is acting as executor, in the savings department of the same bank. A brief reference to the general powers, duties, and obligations of executors and administrators clarifies the meaning of the words in "proper cases," as used in that section. An executor serves in a fiduciary capacity and his powers, duties, and obligations are in many respects the same as those of a trustee. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1613, 1614; 11 Cal. Jur. 211 and 981 et seq. However, unlike a trustee whose duty it is to invest all trust funds as soon as possible (Civ. Code, § 2261), the primary duty of an executor is simply to preserve the estate until distribution. 11 Cal. Jur. 1021. He is placed under no statutory obligation to invest money belonging to the estate, but investment in securities of the United States or of this state is permitted under prior order of court upon good cause shown therefor. Code Civ. Proc. § 1592. Ordinarily there is no investment in the ordinary sense of that term of the funds coming into the hands of an executor, but it is customary and proper for him to deposit those funds in either a commercial or savings department of a responsible bank. 11 Cal. Jur. 1023. His authority to so deposit funds of the estate arises from his obligation to safeguard and protect the funds and not from any obligation to invest them. Where funds are to be in his hands for a very short time or where practically all of the funds will be required for the immediate needs of administration, deposit in a commercial account subject to check is proper. On the other hand, in cases where there is a substantial sum in excess of the immediate requirements, which sum is to be held over a period which will permit the accrual of interest on a savings bank deposit, he should be required to safeguard and protect these funds in a manner most advantageous to the estate, and to that end it is proper that he should deposit the funds in a savings account rather than in a noninterest-bearing commercial account.

[6] From what has been said we believe that the meaning of the phrase "in proper cases" is apparent. The time within which the estate may be distributed, the time of the receipt of the funds, and the immediate need for funds in order to meet the requirements of administration, are all factors in determining whether it is proper for the executor of a particular estate to deposit the funds in a commercial account or a savings account. In the estates here involved we must assume from the evidence and findings that each presented a proper case for the deposit of funds in a savings account. No contention to the contrary is made in the argument for affirmance. We therefore conclude that under section 25 of the act the action of the bank in depositing the funds of these estates in its own savings bank department was expressly authorized.

[7, 8] Counsel appearing as amici curiæ for affirmance argue that even assuming that deposit in the savings bank department in the same bank is permitted by section 25, it must be construed to permit a special deposit without mingling or use of the funds and not a general deposit. We cannot follow counsel's reasoning. Such construction would render meaningless the amendment to section 32 above set forth whereby the mingling of trust funds with other assets is permitted as provided in section 25. A special deposit is a mere bailment for safe-keeping in which the title remains in the depositor and the bank cannot mingle such deposit with other funds. 4 Cal. Jur. 189. It is obvious that no interest would accrue on special deposits, as the bank cannot put them to use. Unless the amendments to section 25 and section 32 are construed to refer to a general deposit permitting the mingling and use of the funds in the same manner as other general deposits, interest would not accrue to the benefit of the estate and the deposit of the estate funds in the savings bank department would serve no purpose whatsoever.

[9] Counsel further contend that if section 25 is construed to permit not only deposit but also mingling and use, it would be unconstitutional, being class legislation and creating a discriminatory preference in favor of departmental bank trustees and against all other trustees. We find no merit in this contention. It is conceded that this classification would be valid if based upon some natural and intrinsic difference between departmental banks as trustees and others acting in the same capacity. It has been heretofore decided that where legislation affects banking corporations doing business as testamentary trustees as a class and such classification is not unreasonable, there is no valid constitutional objection to such legislation. Estate of Barnett, 97 Cal. App. 138, 275 P. 453. We find nothing unreasonable in such classification here and, in our opinion there is a natural and intrinsic difference between departmental bank trustees and other trustees. The various sections of the Bank Act relating to capital, surplus, reserves, securities, inspection, and the like (Bank Act, §§ 90, 96, 97, 98, 101, 103, 105, 106), surround every activity of departmental bank trustees with safeguards not required of trustees generally.

In arguing for affirmance counsel dwell at some length upon the policy involved in permitting departmental banks to deposit trust funds in their savings bank departments to be used in the same manner as other deposits. We deem it unnecessary to discuss the policy involved, for it is upon this question of policy that the Legislature has spoken and it acted within its province in so doing.

[10] For the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the final account of the executor in each of these estates should have been settled and allowed as filed and that the trial court erred in charging the executor with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. instead of 4 per cent. compounded semiannually as set forth in the account. As no other exception is taken to the orders and decrees, there is no necessity for reversing these orders and decrees, but directions to the trial court to correct them will suffice (Estate of Machado, 186 Cal. 246, 199 P. 505; Estate of Adams, 131 Cal. 415, 63 P. 838), and under the circumstances we believe it proper that the parties should bear their own costs.

In the Matter of the Estate of Edward McCord Smith, No. 7781, the trial court is directed to correct the order and decree in accordance with the views herein expressed by charging the executor with interest in the sum of $706.13 as set forth in the final account and no more, and as so corrected and modified said order and decree are and each of them is affirmed without costs.

Automobile guest taking minor in her custody for automobile ride against minor's wishes was not fully "in loco parentis" toward minor as regards minor's recovery against driver for injuries (St. 1923, p. 517, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

> Facts showed that the minor had been placed in the custody of the guest in a city in another state for the purpose of care and maintenance, that the mother was paying for the support of the minor and retained the right to direct and control the minor, but that against the mother's direction, automobile guest and driver, against the minor's will and protest, took the minor by automobile from such city to a point within the state where an accident occurred, in which the minor was injured.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Mary Alice Kastel, a minor, by her guardian ad litem, Leo B. Baisden, against Mrs. John L. Stieber and Edith M. Swan. From the judgment, Edith M. Swan appeals.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendant Edith M. Swan for and on account of personal injuries sustained in an automobile accident which occurred in the city of Sacramento, on the 10th day of October, 1929. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

It is not claimed in this action that the damages awarded are excessive. The only issue tendered is that under the provisions of section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act of 1929 (St. 1929, p. 1580), the plaintiff is not entitled to any judgment.

The record shows that Mary Alice Kastel was a minor of the age of 8 years, and for some 4 years preceding the 10th day of October, 1929, had been living with her aunt in Longview, Wash. The father of said minor was deceased; the mother had married again, but was furnishing for the support of said Mary Alice Kastel the sum of about $20 per month, had never surrendered her legal right to the control and custody of said minor, and in the language of the findings, retained the "say-so" as to said minor.

A short time prior to the 10th day of October 1929, the appellant, Edith M. Swan, conceived the idea of driving to Riverside, in the state of California, and invited Mrs. John L. Stieber to accompany her, and to take the plaintiff along. The plaintiff, having suffered a minor injury in an automobile accident that had occurred previous to this proposed trip, strenuously objected to riding in the automobile, but was compelled by the defendants to accompany them on the proposed journey, the record showing that the plaintiff wished to remain with Mr. Stieber in Longview, or make the journey by train, and protested so strenuously that when the defendant started from Longview, Wash., it was necessary for the defendant, Edith M. Swan, to hold the plaintiff in the automobile which the parties were using in starting on their trip.

The record further shows that the two defendants alternated in driving the car, and in making the journey from Longview to Sacramento, drove at a very high rate of speed; that after reaching Sacramento they resumed their journey southward at about 1 o'clock in the afternoon, and proposed making the city of Fresno in time to have their hair dressed and attend a theater at the latter city. As the defendants were leaving the city of Sacramento by way of Stockton boulevard, the accident occurred which led to the injury of the plaintiff. It appears that the defendant Stieber was at the wheel, and that the automobile, along the section of the boulevard designated as a business section, and where the signs limited the speed to 15 miles an hour, was being driven at the rate of about 25 miles an hour; that as defendants approached what counsel admit to be a residential section or a section where the speed limit is 20 miles an hour, the speed of the car was considerably accelerated. An eyewitness, who saw the car after it had speeded up and witnessed the accident to which we shall refer, testified that the car was moving at the rate of 40 miles an hour, or more. The defendant Stieber testified that at the request of the defendant Swan, she speeded up the car. This speeding up took place after driving at the rate of 25 miles per hour, as heretofore stated. This witness, however, testified that she did not think she was going 40 miles an hour at the time of the accident, but did not know how fast she was going. The eyewitness to whom we have referred was a motorman in charge of a street car at the time of the accident, and testified that he saw the car coming from a distance of about a block away. The scene of the accident may be described as follows: Stockton boulevard is a paved highway leading out of the city of Sacramento in a southerly direction. Along the east side of the boulevard are street car tracks belonging to the P. G. and E. Company. These street car tracks, after extending along the easterly side of the boulevard, upon reaching Fourth avenue, make a right-hand turn to the west, crossing the boulevard and extending on toward the main portion of the city of Sacramento. At the time of the accident a street car was moving slowly southward preparatory to crossing the boulevard. As it reached the track of what is known as and called the "California Traction Company's" lines, which likewise extend along the easterly side of the boulevard, the street car stopped. The driver of the automobile, the defendant Stieber, observing the motion of the street car, according to her testimony, turned to the right to avoid striking the street car, apparently not noticing that the street car had come to a complete stop. In so turning the automobile to the right, Mrs. Stieber drove the car across the right curbing of the boulevard and struck a trolley pole 18 inches in thickness, breaking the pole in two and throwing the plaintiff through the windshield onto the pavement, injuring her severely. The map introduced in evidence showing the scene of the accident discloses that the automobile driven by the defendants might very readily have been turned westward on Fourth avenue, if such had been necessary to avoid colliding with the street car. Mrs. Stieber testified that she did not see the trolley pole against which she drove the speeding automobile.

This recital shows that the automobile in which the defendants were riding was being driven at a very high rate of speed within the corporate limits of the city of Sacramento, past intersecting streets, and we may here add that the testimony shows that the defendants had passed a few cars on their way southward, as well as passing the intersecting streets, at a speed greatly in excess of that permitted by the California Vehicle Act. So far as the record shows, it does not appear that the defendants made any effort whatever to stop the progress of the car, but maintained the same high rate of speed until striking the trolley pole. The pole in question was a few feet west of the west curb of the boulevard.

The action was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and from the findings of fact made by the court, we make the following summary: That at the time and place the said Mary Alice Kastel was being driven by the defendants in said automobile, Mary Alice Kastel had not accepted a ride therein from both or either of said defendants, was not in said automobile of her own volition, but was riding therein entirely under the direction, dominion, and control of the defendants. That after the death of the father of Mary Alice Kastel, the defendant Stieber undertook, on her part, to take care of and support the said Mary Alice Kastel; that the mother of said Mary Alice Kastel agreed to pay said Stieber, for the support of Mary Alice Kastel, the sum of $20 per month, and set apart the income from a certain residence in the state of Minnesota for such purpose; that the income from said house had averaged $20 per month, and had been paid to said Mrs. Stieber by the mother of said Mary Alice Kastel; that during all of the period which we have heretofore mentioned, Mary Alice Kastel had lived with the said Mrs. John L. Stieber; that Mrs. Stieber had made arrangements for her schooling, and during said time stood in the place of a parent to said Mary Alice Kastel; that said Mary Alice Kastel had always been afraid to ride in an automobile; that this fear was increased by reason of a prior minor automobile accident occurring to the automobile in which she was then riding; that Mary Alice Kastel wanted to stay at Longview with the husband of Mrs. Stieber instead of going to Riverside, but stated that if she went to Riverside she wanted to go by train; that said minor entered said automobile of the defendants at the command and under the direction of said Mrs. John L. Stieber, and after she was put in said automobile, tried to get out; that at the time of the accident, Mary Alice Kastel was being transported from Longview, in the state of Washington, to Riverside, in the state of California, for the benefit of said minor's health; that said minor entered said automobile unwillingly; that because of the age and dependence of said Mary Alice Kastel she did not and could not accept a ride in said automobile; that at said time, the mother of Mary Alice Kastel retained the "say-so" as to said minor; that prior to the taking of said Mary Alice Kastel from the state of Washington on the proposed trip, the mother of said Mary Alice Kastel told Mrs. John L. Stieber that Mary Alice Kastel would be all right in Washington; that said Mrs. Stieber did not obtain the consent of the mother of Mary Alice Kastel to bring her to the state of California, and did not tell the mother of said minor that they were going to California; that said Mrs. John L. Stieber was at all times riding as a guest of Edith M. Swan, in said automobile; and that the said Mary Alice Kastel, at the time of the accident, was an involuntary guest riding therein.

The court further found: "That at the time and place mentioned in said complaint, the defendants so negligently and carelessly operated said automobile that they caused said automobile to collide with the trolley-pole at the northwest corner of the intersection of Stockton boulevard and Fourth avenue, in the city of Sacramento, California; that the negligence of said defendants was not gross." Findings were then made as to the injuries suffered by the plaintiff, damages awarded, and judgment entered against the defendant Edith M. Swan. Judgment was not entered against the defendant Stieber, for the reason that the court concluded as follows: "That defendant Mrs. John L. Stieber stood in loco parentis to the said minor at the time of said accident."

Do the facts which we have epitomized warrant a judgment against either of the defendants in view of the "guest" law of this state, and do the undisputed facts necessitate the amending of the findings by striking the word "not" from finding No. 4 which we have quoted, so as to make the concluding words read, "That the negligence of the defendants was gross?"

[1] While the court found that at the time of the accident the defendant Mrs. John L. Stieber was occupying the relationship of a parent to the plaintiff in this action, it is evident that such relationship was not full and complete in the ordinary meaning of the words "in loco parentis." The findings show that the plaintiff had been placed in the custody and care of Mrs. Stieber in Longview, Wash., not for the purpose of being transported to some other city in a distant state, but for the purpose of care and maintenance at the city of Longview; that the mother was paying for the support of said minor, the sum of $20 per month; that at all times the mother retained the right to direct as to the custody and control of the plaintiff, the language of the finding being, "retained the say-so," which we interpret to be a colloquial expression of the right to direct and determine what should be done with respect to the minor. The mother in this case had expressed her judgment that the minor would be all right in the city of Longview, Wash.; that notwithstanding this direction, the defendants, against her will and against her protest, took the minor by automobile from Longview, Wash., and reached the city of Sacramento, Cal., on their journey to Riverside. Thus, only to a very limited extent can it be said that the defendant Stieber stood in "loco parentis" toward the plaintiff. In other words, it shows an act without right and without the knowledge and consent of the mother.

[2] The court found that the plaintiff did not accept a ride in the automobile, which is equivalent to a finding that a ride in the automobile was forced upon the plaintiff. The word "accept" has a definite meaning. In 1 C. J. p. 377, it is thus defined: "To admit and agree to; to accede to, or consent to; to receive with approval; to adopt; to agree to. In the past tense the word is commonly used to signify assent and agreement."

The meaning of the word "agreement" is thus set forth in 2 C. J. p. 979: "In its broad and comprehensive sense, demonstrated by general usage, a coming or knitting together of minds; a coming together in opinion or determination; the coming together, in accord, of two minds, on a given proposition. * * * In law, a concord of understanding and intention, between two or more parties, with respect to the effect upon their relative rights and duties of certain past or future facts or performances; the consent of two or more persons concurring respecting the transmitting of some property, rights, or benefits, with the view of contracting an obligation, a mutual obligation," etc.

So far as the plaintiff is concerned, the record shows that she did nothing from which a conclusion can be drawn that she accepted a ride, nor are there any facts in the record to support any such inference. As heretofore stated, the person with whom the plaintiff was staying in Longview, Wash., had no permission from the mother, who had the legal right to determine whether the minor should or should not be taken from Longview, in the state of Washington, to Riverside, in the state of California, but proceeded without any authority so to do. It thus appears that Mrs. Stieber had no right, by reason of the mere custody of the plaintiff, in Longview, Wash., to enter into any contractual relations with Mrs. Swan affecting the rights of the plaintiff. Her control and custody was limited to Longview, Wash., and she could not, by reason of not having permission from the mother who retained the "say-so," to accept, for and on behalf of the minor, a ride in an automobile, so as to relieve the owner of the automobile from acts of negligence. The law in relation to the protection of minors is explicit and direct. Thus, as said in 46 C. J. p. 1317: "The parent has no authority, merely because of the parental relation, to waive, release, or compromise by or against his child. The rule applies to a waiver, settlement or release of the child's right of action for a personal injury or other tort." Likewise, in actions against the minor where service of process is necessary, there can be no waiver. The rule is stated in 31 C. J. p. 1155, as follows: "Where personal service upon an infant is required, he cannot waive such service by voluntary appearance, nor can any other person do so for him."

[3] Counsel for respondent have cited a number of California cases supporting the text of Corpus Juris from which we have quoted, but the rules set forth in the text are so fully established that we do not deem it necessary to cite further authorities.

We do not question the correctness of the rule set forth in 20 California Jurisprudence, p. 410, that: "The parent is the natural guardian of the person and property of the child, responsible to the state for the child's well-being, and accountable to third persons for the child's wrongful acts. Hence, the parent is accorded authority to control the child and to administer restraint and punishment, whereby to compel obedience to reasonable and necessary commands." But it does not follow from this that Mrs. Stieber was within her legal rights as a parent in directing the plaintiff to take the motor trip. As we have shown, her custody, control, and dominion were limited, and did not extend to taking the child on a long and hazardous trip. Therefore, any defense built upon such a premise fails to reach a logical conclusion of nonliability. The plaintiff was an involuntary occupant, not a guest within the meaning of the Vehicle Act.

There being no substantial conflict in the testimony as to the manner in which the automobile was being driven at the time of its collision with the trolley pole, should the findings of the trial court be amended so as to characterize the acts of the defendants as gross negligence? Many cases have been cited by the appellant in support of the contention that findings of the court cannot be amended by an appellate tribunal; however, all of the cases holding that appellate courts have no power in this respect were decided prior to the adoption of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and no longer state the correct rule. The precise question argued by the appellant came before this court and was decided in the case of Burch v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co., 85 Cal. App. 542, 259 P. 1108. This court there said: "Under section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, the appellate court, in a case where a trial by jury has been waived, may order that certain findings and conclusions of law be amended and enter judgment in accordance with the evidence, which is without conflict on any material point, and terminate the cause without further litigation."

In the recent case of Le Blond v. Townsley, 290 P. 1051, 1053, where the trial court had failed to make the necessary findings to support the judgment, the District Court of Appeal of the Fourth District used the following language: "This court therefore finds that the allegations of the affirmative defense of the answer, charging the plaintiff with contributory negligence, are untrue. With this addition to the findings the judgment is affirmed."

In Kirk v. Culley, 202 Cal. 501, 261 P. 994, the Supreme Court, speaking of the amendment to the Constitution, and also the adoption of section 956a, Code of Civil Procedure, said: "It was intended to broaden the powers of the Supreme Court and the district courts of appeal in the disposition of appeals in cases where a jury trial does not exist as a matter of right, or where, if the right does exist, it has been waived; and those courts are expressly authorized to make findings of fact contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court, either upon the evidence heard in the trial court, or in the appellate court," etc. The court then proceeded to make additional findings.

In the recent case of Tupman v. Haberkern, 208 Cal. 256, 280 P. 970, 974, the Supreme Court, after a full and careful review of the power conferred upon appellate courts by section 4¾ of article 6 of the Constitution, and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, thus points out the rule to be followed: "In the light of the history of the constitutional amendment and the phraseology of the legislation adopted pursuant thereto, and having in contemplation the evils or defects in practice and procedure thus attempted to be remedied, we perceive the primary and principal purpose of the change in the law to be that, whenever possible, and the interests of justice would seem to require, the reviewing court should have the power to make new findings contrary to or in addition to those made by the trial court, either on the record presented or on new evidence to be taken under the direction of the court, all with reference to material issues framed by the pleadings, to the end that the judgment or order appealed from may be affirmed and further litigation terminated, and where otherwise under the old practice the judgment or order would have to be reversed."

[4] It necessarily follows from these decisions that where there is no substantial conflict in the testimony, and the appellate court is of the opinion that the testimony warrants a different finding, and such finding is material in support of the judgment rendered, it is the duty of the appellate court to make such finding or to amend the finding of the trial court.

[5] Does the testimony warrant a finding of gross negligence? It is admitted by the appellant that the automobile was being driven in excess of the legal limit. The testimony of the motorman, who witnessed the approach of the speeding car, was to the effect that the automobile was traveling at the rate of 40 miles per hour. The driver of the car stated that she did not know how fast she was driving, but did not think she was driving 40 miles an hour. The evidence shows, however, that after she had been driving 25 miles an hour, she was directed to and did speed up the momentum of the automobile. There is one physical fact which indicates almost incontrovertibly that the testimony of the motorman was absolutely correct. The speeding automobile passed over the curbing on the west side of the boulevard, struck and broke in two a trolley pole which was 18 inches in thickness. This of itself, we think, is strong corroborative testimony if not an absolute demonstration of the correctness of the testimony of the motorman. During all the time the automobile was being driven upon Stockton boulevard, it was passing intersecting streets. It is true the testimony does not show that it passed any cars between Third and Fourth avenues, but it was speeding past intersecting streets, as we have stated, and along the side of the street car track, upon which a street car was moving slowly was plainly visible. That it is extremely hazardous to propel an automobile at a speed beyond the legal limit, and approaching the speed testified to in this case, past intersecting streets, within the corporate and built-up limits of a city, we think is beyond question. In this case the speeding was an intentional act. That such speeding on the streets of a city can only be done without regard to the rights or safety of persons and property who may at any time be expected to use the same streets, or coming thereon from intersecting streets, seems to us likewise beyond contradiction. There was nothing to prevent the occupants of the automobile in question from seeing the trolley pole with which the automobile collided. We are unalterably of the conclusion that no private automobile, and no automobile not excepted by the terms of the Vehicle Act can be propelled upon built-up streets within the corporate limits of any city where there are intersecting streets, at a speed of 40 miles per hour, or at a speed approaching that excessiveness, without an indifference as to the rights and safety of others who may have occasion to use the same, and therefore, with a greater or less indifference to the safety of the persons riding in the automobile so being driven along the streets of a city.

That the defendants were violating a statute of the state stands admitted; therefore, the language of the Supreme Court in Benjamin v. Noonan, 207 Cal. 279, 277 P. 1045, 1046, is pertinent, to wit: "While it is undoubtedly correct to say that the act of driving a vehicle over a street or public highway beyond the speed limit established by a municipal ordinance or a statute merely constitutes evidence of negligence in cases where damage has followed the infraction of such an ordinance or law, the rule in this state is, however, that it is conclusive evidence of negligence (citing cases). Therefore, the statement that such an act is 'of itself negligence,' or 'negligence as a matter of law' or 'negligence per se' (equivalent expressions) is, in this state, strictly correct." (Citing a number of authorities.)

[6] In 45 C. J. p. 678, the rule is thus stated: "Violation of a statute or ordinance does not of itself constitute willfulness or wantonness, but it may be considered as a circumstance tending to show that the act or omission in question was wilful or wanton, as being entirely regardless of the law and the safety of others." In this state gross negligence does not involve the elements of either wilfulness or wantonness. If the intent to do the act constituting negligence is present, it is not necessary that it be willful or wanton in order to conclude that the circumstances surrounding the performance of the act establish gross negligence.

In the recent case of Malone v. Clemow et al. (Cal. App.) 295 P. 70, 71, we find the meaning of the words "gross negligence" considered. It is there said: "Gross negligence has been defined to be 'the want of slight diligence.' Redington v. Pacific Postal Telegraph Cable Co., 107 Cal. 317, 40 P. 432, 434, 48 Am. St. Rep. 132; Walther v. Southern Pacific Co., 159 Cal. 775, 116 P. 51, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 235; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 49; Krause v. Rarity et al. (Cal. Sup.) 293 P. 62, 66; Coit v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 130 Cal. 657, 63 P. 83, 53 L. R. A. 678, 80 Am. St. Rep. 153; Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., 43 Cal. App. 416, 185 P. 510, 512; 19 Cal. Jur. 554. In the recent case of Krause v. Rarity, supra, the Supreme Court, in considering the meaning of the phrase 'gross negligence' as used in section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act, said: 'In many jurisdictions the division of negligence into degrees is not countenanced (20 R. C. L. 21); the concept being that such phrases as "gross negligence" and "slight negligence" are misnomers. In this state the degrees of negligence have been frequently recognized. The term "gross negligence" has been defined as "the want of slight diligence," as "an entire failure to exercise care, or the exercise of so slight a degree of care as to justify the belief that there was an indifference to the things and welfare of others," and as "that want of care which would raise a presumption of the conscious indifference to consequences."' We should not confuse 'gross negligence' with 'wilful misconduct,' because there is a clear distinction between the two terms. In Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., supra, the court said: '"Wilful misconduct" means something different from and more than negligence, however gross. * * * The mere failure to perform a statutory duty is not, alone, willful misconduct. * * * To constitute "willful misconduct" there must be actual knowledge, or that which in the law is esteemed to be the equivalent to actual knowledge, or the peril to be apprehended from the failure to act, coupled with a conscious failure to act to the end of averting injury.' See, also, Tognazzini v. Freeman, 18 Cal. App. 468, 123 P. 540; Eylenfeldt v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 28 Cal. App. 56, 151 P. 293; Figlietti v. Frick, 203 Cal. 246, 263 P. 534. Appellants argue that some act of willfulness and wantonness must be shown to constitute gross negligence; or, in other words, that either willfulness or wantonness is a necessary element of gross negligence. It is clear from the foregoing authorities that this is not correct, for, whenever the element of knowledge and willfulness enters into the act, it ceases to be negligence, and becomes at least 'willful misconduct,' and this is true no matter what degree of negligence is being considered." In the Clemow Case the record shows that the driver of the automobile was proceeding along one of the streets of Berkeley, upon a clear night, where the streets were artificially lighted, so that an object on the street was clearly distinct at a distance of 200 feet or more; that the course of the automobile was not obstructed by any other automobile; and that the automobile was driven into the rear of a parked truck upon which there was a red light; that the automobile had been traveling for several blocks at a speed of from 30 to 35 miles per hour. No explanation was offered why she did not see the parked truck and its tail-light until within about 12 feet distant therefrom. The court held that the facts established gross negligence. In the instant case the driver of the automobile simply said that she did not see the trolley pole. In the Clemow Case, just cited, the automobile was being driven at a speed of from 30 to 35 miles per hour, which of course was negligence per se, being contrary to the California Vehicle Act. Under the facts in the case of Malone v. Clemow, supra, and the law there announced, we think the facts in the instant case demanded a like finding on the part of the trial court.

The appellant relies upon a number of Washington cases where the subject of gross negligence has been considered. The Supreme Court of Washington, in its definition of "gross negligence," follows the definition given by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, which differs very materially from the definition adopted by the courts of this state.

In Bentson, Administrator, etc., v. Brown, 186 Wis. 629, 203 N. W. 380, 381, 38 A. L. R. 1417, we find that Wisconsin holds gross negligence to be defined as follows: "It is the settled law of this state that in order to constitute gross negligence there must be either a willful intent to injure, or that reckless and wanton disregard of the rights and safety of another or of his property, and that willingness to inflict injury, which the law deems equivalent to an intent to injure." This definition is supported by a number of authorities. In that case the driver of an automobile drove past a schoolhouse just as the pupils were emerging therefrom. The rate of speed of the automobile was about 20 miles per hour. A boy dashing suddenly in front of the automobile was stricken down. It was held by the trial court that gross negligence was not shown. Even in that case there was a dissenting opinion based upon the fact that the legal limit was exceeded by the driver of the automobile. One sentence is to some extent pertinent here. It is: "The act of the defendant in driving at an unlawful rate of speed by school grounds was intentional, willful, utterly reckless, and in disregard of human life." If we eliminate the reference to "willfulness" and "utter recklessness," the quotation would be strictly applicable, as the rate of speed in the instant case was intentional, and as we have shown, also in disregard of the rights of others who might be expected to emerge from the intersecting streets.

In the recent case of Craig v. McAtee et al., 295 P. 146, 148, we find the Supreme Court of Washington approving the definition of gross negligence announced by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, to wit: " 'Gross negligence' has been defined to be the want of even slight care. Saxe v. Terry, 140 Wash. 503, 250 P. 27; Blood v. Austin, 149 Wash. 41, 270 P. 103. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in the case of Bentson v. Brown, 186 Wis. 629, 203 N. W. 380, 384, 38 A. L. R. 1417, refers to its definition of gross negligence as ' "such a degree of rashness or wantonness * * * as evinces a total want of care for the safety" of others.' " (Citing Ryan v. La Crosse City R. Co., 108 Wis. 122, 83 N. W. 770.) And again, as "reckless and wanton disregard of the rights and safety of another or of his property, and that willingness to inflict injury, which the law deems equivalent to an intent to injure," etc. As repeatedly stated by our own courts, the element of wantonness, rashness, and recklessness do not enter into the definition of gross negligence.

Following the definition which we have just stated, the Supreme Court of Washington, in the case of Dailey v. Phoenix Investment Co. et al., 155 Wash. 597, 285 P. 657, 658, held that the following facts did not constitute gross negligence: After stating that a party by the name of Twohy was driving, the opinion goes on to state: "The road to the city, at least for a considerable distance from the clubhouse, was an ordinary gravel road about 20 feet in width. A short distance from the clubhouse, the road became what is referred to in the testimony as the 'straightaway,' of about three-quarters of a mile to a mile in length. At approximately the end of this 'straightaway' another road crossed at right angles the road upon which the parties hereto were proceeding. The right-angle turn, however, had been done away with by a curve, which left an unimproved triangular space between the old right-angle turn and the new curve which formed a connection between the road upon which the parties were driving and the crossroad. In this space, which is referred to in the testimony as 'the triangle,' there stood a telephone pole, and also some large rocks, or boulders, which had been thrown into the 'triangle'; that area being a little below the surface of the road. Testimony introduced by appellant tended to show that there was considerable loose gravel on the road at and near the curve; the gravel being thicker on the right-hand portion of the road, facing toward Yakima, than in the middle thereof. As the automobile entered upon the 'straightaway,' it attained a speed of approximately 40 miles an hour, and appellant signalled to a couple of cars ahead of him, in which were riding persons who had also been to the dance, that he desired to pass them. This was safely accomplished, and the car continued on its way. As the car entered upon the curve in the road above referred to, it left the roadbed, and collided with some of the debris in the 'triangle,' the shock throwing respondent from the car and inflicting upon her the injuries of which she complains."

Following the same rule, the Supreme Court of Washington, in Blood v. Austin, 149 Wash. 41, 270 P. 103, 104, held that the following facts did not constitute gross negligence: "Mrs. Blood testified that during the first 20 miles on the return trip the respondent was cautioned several times by others in the car about driving too fast. That he was thus cautioned was denied by him and his wife. In this respect, however, as well as others, we accept the testimony most favorable to the appellant. The weather was cold, below freezing, and appellant testified that the respondent drove rather fast, by spurts. About two miles further on the accident happened, on a right-hand curve in the highway. All along, the road was in good condition. It was a graveled road; the traveled portion being 20 feet wide. Two hundred and fifty feet from the curve there was the usual caution sign of 'Curve 250 feet.' Appellant testified that the respondent started to speed up about 100 to 200 feet from the sign, at which time his speed was estimated at 30 to 40 miles an hour, at which time her husband asked him to go slow. * * * The curve was 75 to 100 feet in length, around a hillside on the right. The car ran against a railing on the left, which gave way about the center of the curve, causing the car to topple down an embankment, resulting in the death of Mr. Blood. Upon approaching the curve, and within it, the right-hand side of the road had chuck holes or ice pockets, as they were called by different witnesses, and in taking the curve the car was driven along the center of the roadway. The roadway was frozen and covered with loose, round gravel or rocks, as different witnesses described it, similar to the situation in the case of Saxe v. Terry, 140 Wash. 503, 250 P. 27, causing a lateral skidding or sliding on the pebbles of the wheels of the car to the left, until the railing was struck. Upon examination it was found that the posts supporting the railing were rotten. There was no other traffc in the vicinity at that time."

The same rule is followed in Heiman v. Kloizner, 139 Wash. 655, 247 P. 1034, the facts of which need not be recited, but which show that the court had in view that gross negligence included an idea of the heedless and reckless disregard of the rights of others, merging upon wantonness and wilfulness.

In the case of Adair v. Newkirk, 148 Wash. 165, 268 P. 153, 154, the Supreme Court of Washington held an act of an automobile driver, when turning out to pass a car traveling in the same direction, misjudging the distance of an approaching car and causing a collision, to be gross negligence. A portion of the opinion in that case, somewhat approaching the facts in the case at bar, shows facts constituting gross negligence: "Newkirk while admitting that he overtook and passed a car going 30 or 35 miles per hour, that he attained a speed of at least 40 miles an hour in doing so, and that he saw the lights of the approaching car at all times, seeks to justify his act by his own testimony to the effect that the lights on the approaching car were dim and yellowish, and he was thereby misled as to its nearness and was guilty only of an error of judgment. There was little, if any, corroboration of his testimony in this respect, and the trial court found against him on the facts. That finding being well supported by a preponderance of the testimony, we are content to adopt it and with it the conclusion that Newkirk was guilty of gross negligence. In so concluding we have in mind what was said in Heiman v. Kloizner, supra, * * * to the effect that varying degrees of negligence or of required care cannot be differentiated with any sort of precision. The difference is not in principle, but in degree only. Therefore where, as here, there is shown that no care whatever was exercised, in a situation obviously involving great danger, the conclusion of gross negligence follows."

The Washington cases, as to their facts, are further distinguished from the circumstances surrounding the instant case in that the Washington cases all took place on the open highway, and it is not stated in any of them that the speed law was being violated, while in the instant case, the facts relate to circumstances which took place within the limits of an incorporated city, where the speeding automobile was passing intersecting streets at approximately twice the legal limit.

In Pepper v. Morrill, 24 F.(2d) 320, 321, 57 A. L. R. 750, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First District held the following facts, which are in many respects similar to the facts in the instant case, sufficient to establish gross negligence: One of the witnesses testified that the car was speeding along at about 50 miles per hour; that the driver had been warned not to drive so rapidly; that once or twice he had gone around a curve so as to give the automobile the sensation of tipping over. The accident occurred at the fork of two roads. We take from the opinion the following: "At the fork in the road there was a wooden fence and two or three lamp posts. As the defendant attempted to turn to the left from the Ware road, the right-hand side of the car collided with the fence and one of the lamp posts, breaking down both, and bringing up against a telegraph pole, which was pushed to one side, but not broken off. The plaintiff's husband was instantly killed, she was seriously injured, and the defendant was rendered unconscious. A member of the state constabulary, who was doing police duty in the vicinity of the accident, proceeded there immediately after it occurred, and testified that there was a hill just before reaching the scene of the accident from West Brookfield; 'that the hill was straight about halfway down, and a curve started to the left about halfway down to the bottom; * * * that there is a fork in the road, one road going to Ware, and the other to Springfield. At this fork in the road the hill was still descending; not so much, but still a grade. On the Ware road it continues to be a hill; on the Springfield road, just a slight grade; that at the fork in the road there was a state fence—white fence made of wood—and at the corner, the junction of the two roads, the Y, there were two or three lamp posts. This car had broken the fence, and also one of the posts, and sideswiped the fence and one of the posts at the same time. There was a big telegraph pole, which was pushed to one side to a certain extent, but was not broken off.'" This was held to constitute gross negligence. The speeding in this instance was on the open highway. Whether it was beyond the legal limit does not appear from the opinion. At the time the automobile involved in this action struck the pole, the facts in the record indicate that the street car was on the other side of a broad street at least 50 feet away, and at a complete stop; that there was nothing in front of the automobile to prevent its traveling on its course.

As further indicating the peril of driving an automobile on city streets, it may be stated that the speed, indicated by the testimony in this case, at which the automobile was traveling, the time consumed from intersection to intersection, was approximately five or six seconds, which certainly indicates the intent of the defendants to get by without due regard to the obvious danger of driving at such a high rate of speed. The appellant in this case did not take the stand to contradict or vary, in any particular, the testimony of the motorman as to the speed of the car, which we have stated, in view of the physical facts, appear to be practically incontrovertibly corroborated as a truthful estimate. It must always be borne in mind that a state of facts relating to an automobile accident out on the open highway cannot be controlling as to the conclusions to be reached upon a corresponding state of facts occurring within city limits. The former might only reasonably be held negligence, while in the latter, owing to the difference in the hazardousness of the situation, gross negligence would only be the right conclusion.

[7] In view of what we have stated and the uncontradicted facts in this case, we conclude that the trial court was in error in not finding gross negligence.

It is therefore ordered that the word "not" be stricken from the last clause in finding No. 4, so as to make the finding conclude as follows: "That the negligence of said defendants was gross."

We do not deem it necessary to further amend the findings relative to the acceptance of the ride by the plaintiff in this action, as what we have said sufficiently covers that question.

The judgment is affirmed.

113 Cal. App. 118

SMITH v. PICKWICK STAGES SYSTEM.

Civ. 7479.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 31, 1931.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1024(3).

Trial court's determination of truth of affidavits on motion for order permitting amendment of complaint was conclusive on appeal.

2. Parties 🔑95(5).

Where president of true defendant was served with summons and complaint and corporation named as defendant was holding company owning all stock of true defendant, amendment of complaint to show true name of defendant was permissible (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

> It could easily be ascertained from examination of original complaint that it was intention of plaintiff to sue P. Stages System, since complaint stated that defendant operated stages between certain cities; that it maintained a terminal at certain address; and that on certain date it employed person named as stage driver. Such facts did not apply to any other corporation, so that any officer of P. Stages System who read complaint must have known exactly what corporation was intended as defendant, and the answer showed that defendant that appeared was in fact P. Stages System, and not P. Corporation, which was named in the original complaint as defendant.

3. Limitation of actions 🔑121(2).

Amendment of complaint correcting name of real party defendant related back to time of filing original complaint, as regards statute of limitations.

4. Appeal and error 🔑910.

Where defendant did not contend its stage driver lacked authority to grant plaintiff privilege of entering stage to look for passenger's purse, driver's authority would be presumed.

5. Negligence 🔑32(2).

One in loading room and also in stage at express invitation of driver and for purpose of aiding in looking for passenger's purse was "invitee."

> [Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Invitee," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Negligence 🔑32(1).

Invitee in loading room of stage company was entitled to ordinary care at hands of stage company's servant.

7. Negligence 🔑32(1).

Where stage driver unloading baggage threw down piece of baggage which hit invitee, who had gotten out of stage after looking for passenger's purse, negligence was shown.

8. Master and servant 🔑332(2).

Evidence held sufficient to support conclusion that stage driver throwing baggage which struck invitee was acting within scope of employment in unloading baggage from stage.

9. Negligence 🔑32(1).

Stage driver hitting invitee with baggage being unloaded held negligent in failing to look and in failing to give warning.

10. Master and servant 🔑300.

Master is liable for servant's torts committed within scope of employment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by Mildred Vera Smith against the Pickwick Stages System. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Barry J. Colding, Theodore Hale, and Carroll B. Crawford, all of San Francisco, and B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles W. Fisher, of Oakland, and Leicester & Leicester, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the defendant, Pickwick Stages System, a corporation, from a judgment entered against it upon the verdict of a jury in the sum of $1,500.

Plaintiff, Mildred Vera Smith, brought this action for damages, charging that she was severely injured in the Union stage station of defendant in San Francisco, through the carelessness and negligence of the driver of one of defendant's stages.

The facts necessary for a correct understanding of the questions involved on this appeal, and which are practically uncontradicted, may be thus briefly stated: On the morning of January 15, 1927, the plaintiff went to the depot of defendant in San Francisco for the purpose of meeting her mother, who had written plaintiff that she would arrive in San Francisco from Los Angeles on a Pickwick stage. Her mother arrived in one of appellant's stages, and was met in the waiting room of said station by plaintiff. Mrs. Dobson, the mother, had lost her purse and thought she had left it in the stage. Plaintiff and Mrs. Dobson went through a door which separates the waiting room from the part of the station where the stages enter and discharge their passengers, called "the unloading room," and through which Mrs. Dobson and the other passengers from Los Angeles had just come. Plaintiff saw the stage driver standing at the rear end of the stage, unloading baggage from it, and after telling him they were looking for a purse, they were instructed and invited by the driver to look in the stage for the purse. This they did, and while plaintiff was in the stage, the driver climbed on the roof of the stage and continued to unload baggage therefrom; he threw down two suitcases to a sailor, who was waiting for them beside the stage. After plaintiff had gotten out of the stage, and had taken a step or two towards the waiting room, the driver threw down a third piece of baggage and it hit plaintiff on the head, inflicting serious injury and rendering her unconscious. The driver jumped off of the stage and helped to carry plaintiff into the waiting room. As he was carrying her into the waiting room he stated to a friend of Mrs. Smith that he had hit her on the head with a sailor's dunnage bag. This same stage driver, however, testified at the trial, which took place about three years after the accident, that the sailor hit plaintiff with the bag, but this testimony was contradicted by the statement made by the driver at the time of the injury, and also by the testimony of Mr. Aubrey, who was an eyewitness to the accident. The sailor did not testify at all in the case. At the time of the injury, the driver was the only one on the top of the stage, and the bag which hit plaintiff came from the top of the stage. The jury found by its verdict that the driver was the one who threw the bag down on plaintiff's head.

Appellant's first contention is this: "The trial court erred in granting plaintiff's motion to amend her complaint, over the objection of appellant, by substituting 'Pickwick Stages System, a Corporation' as defendant herein for 'Pickwick Corporation, a Corporation,' for the reason that any right of action plaintiff might once have had, if any, was barred by the terms of subdivision 3, section 340, Code of Civil Procedure."

This contention is based upon these facts: The original complaint, which was filed on June 30, 1927, named "The Pickwick Corporation, a Corporation, D. G. Vaio (the driver of the stage) and John Doe" as defendants. Summons was issued on June 30, 1927, commanding "The Pickwick Corporation, a Corporation, D. G. Vaio and John Doe," to appear and answer within the statutory time. The return on the summons, made by the sheriff, shows service on "C. F. Wren, President of The Pickwick Corporation, a Corporation, of a copy of summons and complaint." "The Pickwick Corporation, a Corporation" demurred to plaintiff's complaint on September 8, 1927, and answered on October 4, 1927. On June 26, 1929, two years and five months after the accident, the plaintiff filed a motion to "amend her complaint by correcting a mistake in the name of the defendant wherever it occurs therein from the Pickwick Corporation to Pickwick Stages System, the correct name of the defendant herein." Said motion was made upon the following grounds: "(1) That the true name of the defendant is Pickwick Stages System, instead of Pickwick Corporation; (2) That a mistake was made in the name of the defendant in said complaint; (3) That in furtherance of justice the plaintiff should be allowed to amend her complaint by correcting the mistake in the name of the defendant; (4) That Pickwick Stages System has been properly served with the summons and a copy of the complaint herein."

The motion was heard, and the court made the order permitting the amendment, upon the affidavit of Charles W. Fisher, one of plaintiff's attorneys, and the counteraffidavit of C. F. Wren, the president of the Pickwick Corporation, and also president of Pickwick Stages System.

[1] These two affidavits are in direct conflict in every important particular. The trial court accepted the affidavit made on behalf of plaintiff as true. This action of the trial court in determining whom to believe is conclusive on appeal to this court; therefore, the statements in the Fisher affidavit, in favor of plaintiff, must control. Patterson v. Keeney, 165 Cal. 466, 132 P. 1043, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 232; Nelsen v. Joseph, 78 Cal. App. 743, 248 P. 754; Brown v. DeWaard & Sons, 99 Cal. App. 222, 278 P. 257; Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 19, 91 P. 1001; Flood v. Goldstein Co., 158 Cal. 248, 110 P. 916; Corgiat v. Realty Mortgage Corp., 86 Cal. App. 37-40, 260 P. 573.

[2] From the Fisher affidavit, two very essential facts were established: (1) That the president of Pickwick Stages System was actually served with a copy of the summons and complaint in this action, thus giving the court jurisdiction of that corporation; and (2) that, while there were two corporations—one the "Pickwick Corporation" and one "Pickwick Stages System"—nevertheless, they used these names interchangeably throughout California, and that "The Pickwick Corporation" was the holding company and owned all the capital stock of "Pickwick Stages System"; also that "Pickwick Stages System" specifically advertised the stage business under the name of "Pickwick Corporation."

Such an amendment is specifically permitted by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The case at bar is essentially identical with and governed by such cases as Nisbet v. Clio Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 436, 83 P. 1077; Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., 180 Cal. 734, 183 P. 153; Walsh v. Decoto, 49 Cal. App. 737, 194 P. 298; Craig v. San Fernando Furniture Co., 89 Cal. App. 168, 264 P. 784; Lindsey v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. App. 37, 279 P. 837.

In the case of Thompson v. Southern Pacific Company, supra, the original complaint named the defendant as the "Southern Pacific Railroad Company." Five years after the accident out of which the action arose, the pleader discovered that the defendant against whom he had his cause of action was really a corporation by the name of "Southern Pacific Company." Two separate corporations existed—one incorporated under the laws of California, and the other incorporated under the laws of Kentucky. From the outset the plaintiff in that case was pursuing the concern that operated the train with which he collided, and when he discovered he had designated the defendant by a misnomer the court granted him permission to amend to correctly state the name of the defendant he urged his claim against. The Supreme Court held the amendment to be proper. There were, in fact, no new defendants brought in.

The same question was involved in the case of Walsh v. Decoto, supra. In the original complaint in that case the "Blue Taxicab Corporation" was named as the defendant, and was described in the caption of the complaint as a corporation and in the body of the complaint appeared the usual allegation that the defendant was a corporation. Two years after the accident out of which the action arose, and after an answer had been filed on behalf of the Blue Taxicab Corporation, as defendant, the plaintiff discovered that he was in error in designating the concern against whom he was asserting his claim as a corporation; in fact, it appeared that the Blue Taxicab Corporation was not a corporation, but was merely a fictitious name under which one Ezra W. Decoto conducted his business. The court permitted the plaintiff to amend his complaint so that the defendant was designated as Ezra W. Decoto, doing business under the name and style of the Blue Taxicab Corporation. The Court of Appeal sustained the lower court in permitting the amendment, and in that case the change or departure was much more marked than in the case at bar.

In the case at bar, it can be easily ascertained from an examination of the original complaint that it was the intention of the plaintiff to sue "Pickwick Stages System," for the complaint states that the defendant operated stages between Los Angeles and San Francisco; that it maintained a terminal at 75 Fifth street, San Francisco; and that on January 15, 1927, it employed D. G. Vaio as a stage driver. Every one of the facts alleged were and are true as regards the "Pickwick Stages System," but did not apply to any other corporation, so that any officer of the Pickwick Stages System who read the complaint must have known exactly what corporation was intended as defendant. Furthermore, the answer shows that the defendant that appeared was, in fact, the "Pickwick Stages System," and not the Pickwick Corporation, for in the answer to the original complaint not only is a general denial set up, but also a separate defense is interposed, in which the defendant pleads "that the injury was due to the carelessness and negligence of plaintiff and this carelessness and negligence of plaintiff was the sole proximate cause of the injury and damage," etc. This answer was verified so the defendant must surely have known all about the injury when it filed this verified answer, for the facts are not alleged on information and belief, but are stated as absolutely true. It would be very difficult for a defendant who was not a party to the accident to secure such positive information as to the cause thereof. The only corporation which could truthfully swear to such a defense would be the one whose employees and servants had actually participated in the events leading up to the accident. This, of course, was the Pickwick Stages System.

We conclude, therefore, that the trial court did not err in permitting the amendment to be made.

[3] Appellant also contends that the demurrer to the amended complaint, and the plea in the answer raising the statute of limitations, should have been sustained. There is no merit in this contention. The same contention was made in the case of Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., supra; and also in Walsh v. Decoto, supra, and in both cases the court decided the point adversely to appellant's contention. It clearly appears from a reading of the original and amended complaint that the plaintiff at all times was urging her claim for damages against the corporation or concern operating the stage line and stage depot, and that had in its employ as a stage driver one D. G. Vaio. The amended complaint does not state a new and different cause of action, or bring in any new or different party defendant, but merely corrects the name of the real party defendant where a misnomer had occurred. Under such circumstances, the rule is elementary that the amendment relates back to the time of filing the original complaint, so far as the statute of limitations is concerned. Cox v. San Joaquin Light, etc., Co., 33 Cal. App. 522, 166 P. 578; United States Farm Land Co. v. Bennett, 55 Cal. App. 299, 203 P. 794; Alexson v. Steward, 55 Cal. App. 251, 203 P. 423; 16 Cal. Jur. 547 and cases there cited.

It is next contended by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, and under this contention it states that the facts disclose: "(1) That the accident was unavoidable; (2) that plaintiff was at the time of the injury a trespasser, or at the best a bare licensee, as to whom the appellant had only a duty to abstain from wilfully inflicting injury."

We find no merit in any of these contentions.

[4-6] Appellant admits that the plaintiff was an invitee while in the waiting room of its depot, but claims that she was a trespasser when she entered the part of the depot called the "loading room" and the stage for the purpose of searching for the purse. In entering the "loading room" and the stage, plaintiff was there as one of three classes of persons: A trespasser, licensee, or an invitee. If there without the knowledge or consent of the master or servant, she was a trespasser; if there without the knowledge of the master, but with the knowledge of the servant who had no authority to invite her, she was a mere licensee; but if there with the consent of the master or with the consent of the servant, having authority, express or implied, to grant the privilege, she was an invitee. Dyer v. McCorkle, 208 Cal. 216, 280 P. 965.

The uncontradicted evidence shows that plaintiff was in the "loading room" and also in the stage at the express invitation of the driver, who had charge of the driving and unloading of the stage, and there is no contention by appellant that the driver lacked authority from it to grant plaintiff the privilege of entering the "loading room" and stage. The driver's authority will, therefore, be presumed. Plaintiff's legal status was, therefore, that of an invitee in the "loading room" of appellant at the time of her injury, and, as such, she was entitled to ordinary care at the hands of the servant of appellant, and an omission in this particular would be binding upon the master for at the time of the infliction of the injury the servant was engaged in accomplishing an object in the line of duties assigned to him by such master. Dyer v. McCorkle, supra; Ingledue v. Davidson, 102 Cal. App. 697, 283 P. 837; Thompson on the Law of Negligence, p. 146; Madigan v. O. A. Hale & Co., 90 Cal. App. 151, 265 P. 574; Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 201 P. 462; Oles v. Kahn Bros., 81 Cal. App. 76, 253 P. 158.

We think that plaintiff's status was that of an invitee for another reason, to wit: It was the duty of appellant to give its passengers a reasonable opportunity to remove their baggage, and when plaintiff aided in looking for the lost purse, a duty which rested on the stage driver, she was also aiding the appellant; or, in other words, plaintiff, at the time she was injured, was engaged in a matter which was to the mutual advantage of appellant and its passenger, and was therefore an invitee on the premises. O'Grady v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 90 Neb. 339, 133 N. W. 426; Little Rock & Ft. S. Ry. Co. v. Lawton, 55 Ark. 428, 18 S. W. 543, 544, 15 L. R. A. 434, 29 Am. St. Rep. 48.

[7-10] It seems idle to argue that the accident was unavoidable, or that there was no negligence shown in this case on the part of the driver. It was stipulated that Vaio (the man who threw the dunnage bag on respondent's head) was an employee of the defendant, Pickwick Stages System, and had charge of its stage. The evidence is amply sufficient to support the conclusion that he was acting within the scope of his employment in unloading baggage from the stage. The driver was negligent in failing to look where he was throwing the baggage; he was negligent in failing to give warning that a dunnage bag would be thrown from the top of the stage. The law is well established that the master is liable for the torts of the servant if committed by him within the scope of his emploment. O'Callaghan v. Bode, 84 Cal. 489, 24 P. 269; Johnson v. Monson, 183 Cal. 149, 190 P. 635; Ruppe v. City of Los Angeles, 186 Cal. 400, 199 P. 496.

The other contentions made by appellant are also without merit and do not require discussion.

We find no reason to disturb the verdict and judgment. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

MULLIN v. ROUSSEAU et al.

Civ. 7291.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 21, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 20, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 18, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1005(1).

Credibility and weight of testimony are properly matters for jury, and for court on motion for new trial.

2. Fraud ⇨22(1).

Apartment house purchaser justifiably relied on representation that eastern apartments were identical with inspected western apartments; demand to inspect occupied apartments being unnecessary.

It was contended that, since purchaser knew width of lot and had opportunity to view exterior of building and inspect apartments on west side, representations concerning size of apartments on east side of building related to matters which were patent and obvious and would therefore not be actionable.

3. Health ⇨32.

Statute held to prohibit using basement of three-story wooden apartment house for living purposes (St. 1923, pp. 794, 801, §§ 12, 27).

St. 1923, p. 794, § 12, provides that no wooden apartment house shall exceed three stories for living or sleeping purposes at any point, and page 801, § 27, provides that any room in basement of apartment house occupied for living or sleeping purposes must conform to requirements applicable to other rooms.

4. Fraud ⇨10.

Vendor's representations that basement apartments were lawful and were approved by authorities, besides being representation regarding law, included actionable representation of fact (St. 1923, p. 781 et seq.).

It appeared that municipal authorities were in doubt regarding legality of apartments like those involved, and in such cases were accustomed to permit them to be occupied if they were sanitary and complied with certain provisions of St. 1923, p. 781 et seq., and therefore as a practical matter the question of fact whether the municipal authorities had inspected the apartments and issued a permit was of primary importance.

5. Fraud ⇨10.

Representation that basement apartments were lawfully constructed, being on matter of law, is not actionable (St. 1923, pp. 794, 801, §§ 12, 27).

6. Fraud ⇨27.

Grievance of purchaser suing for misrepresentation that basement apartments complied with statute and were approved by municipal authorities arose not solely from statute, but also from absence of municipal approval (St. 1923, pp. 794, 801, §§ 12, 27).

It was contended that purchaser's grievance, if any, arose solely from existence of statute, and not from any actual or threatened interference by municipal authorities, but evidence disclosed that no permit was issued for apartments in question until almost two years after consummation of transaction, and this permit expired after only three months, and that absence of permit gave rise to possibility or threat of interference, thereby decreasing value of apartment house involved.

7. Fraud ⇨33.

To sustain action for fraud in sale or exchange of realty, enforceable written contract between parties before completion of transaction is unnecessary.

8. Fraud ⇨59(2).

Notwithstanding absence of written agreement between parties, damages for fraud in exchange of realty held difference between actual value and value if property had been as represented.

It appeared that, although there was no written agreement of sale or exchange signed by plaintiff and defendants, both parties inspected the apartment houses involved in the exchange, and plaintiff conveyed her apartment house to defendants, and they conveyed to plaintiff, and that, without plaintiff's knowledge, real estate broker who brought parties together agreed to accept reconveyance of plaintiff's property from defendants, inasmuch as defendants desired to sell rather than exchange.

9. Appeal and error ⇨207.
Trial ⇨132.

Misconduct, if any, by counsel in arguing that he accompanied witness when witness found certain evidence held harmless, where counsel withdrew remarks and no request was made to admonish jury.

10. Appeal and error ⇨978(2).

Judge's conclusion, shown by denying new trial, that counsel's misconduct was harmless, should not be disturbed unless plainly wrong.

11. Costs ⚷32(1).

Where jury at first trial were discharged for plaintiff's counsel's misconduct and costs charged to plaintiff as penalty, court after second trial improperly allowed plaintiff, as prevailing party, costs of first trial (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956, 963, 1033).

12. Appeal and error ⚷119, 870(2).

Order taxing costs on mistrial, although nonappealable, was reviewable on appeal from final judgment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956, 963).

13. Appeal and error ⚷1005(3).

That evidence is sharply conflicting and would sustain verdict for either party does not justify disturbing fact conclusions of jury and court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Joseph J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Enid J. Mullin, also known as Enid J. Crippen, also known as Enid J. Bussey, against Charles J. Rousseau and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and orders denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and a motion to tax plaintiff's costs, defendants appeal.

Modified and affirmed.

P. A. Bergerot, A. P. Dessouslavy, and Arthur H. Barendt, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Livingston & Livingston, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SPENCE, J.

Action for fraud. Upon a trial by jury, judgment upon the verdict was entered in favor of plaintiff and against defendants for the sum of $15,500. The trial court thereafter denied defendants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and denied defendants' motion to tax plaintiff's costs. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from the orders denying said motions.

This litigation arose out of a transaction in which plaintiff acquired defendants' apartment house in 1927. In her complaint plaintiff alleged misrepresentation of the size of certain apartments, misrepresentation of the income and expenses, and a misrepresentation to the effect that the apartments on the lobby floor had been built according to law and had been inspected and approved by the municipal authorities. The apartment house, constructed in 1925, was a wooden structure consisting of three main floors of four apartments each and a lobby floor or ground floor or basement, as it has been variously termed, consisting of a lobby and two apartments. Under the original plans for construction there were no apartments on this lobby floor, and the permits for construction and occupancy issued respectively by the board of public works and the department of public health did not contemplate these two apartments. These two apartments were subsequently constructed by appellants and occupied without inspection, approval, or permit by the municipal authorities.

This appeal is taken under the alternative method upon a voluminous transcript. To assist in the determination of the questions presented, counsel have filed voluminous briefs, no one of which is less than 200 pages in length and each brief is arranged under approximately 100 headings. Upon reading these briefs we are convinced that much that has been said is not properly before us for consideration on this appeal. However we will attempt in this opinion to discuss briefly each of the main grounds for reversal urged by appellants.

[1] Appellants attack the testimony of respondent and the witness Cunningham (the real estate salesman who handled the transaction) contending that their testimony was preposterous and so thoroughly discredited as to be insufficient to support any finding in respondent's favor. It will be noted that it is not claimed that there was no evidence to support the implied findings. Although the evidence was conflicting there was ample evidence to show that the misrepresentations were made, believed, and relied upon. In support of their contention appellants indulge in a lengthy argument on matters bearing upon the credibility of these witnesses and the weight to be attached to their testimony. These matters were all proper for the consideration of the jury upon the trial and of the trial court upon motion for new trial. The same argument was no doubt presented in the trial court, and these matters were determined adversely to appellants. On this appeal we are unable to say that the testimony of these witnesses was so preposterous or so thoroughly discredited as to be insufficient as a matter of law to sustain the implied findings of the jury.

[2] Appellants further contend that, even assuming that the representations relating to the size of the apartments on the east side had been made and relied upon, no cause of action would exist since the matters to which they related were patent and obvious. A discussion of this contention requires some reference to the evidence. Respondent testified in substance that three apartments on the west side of the building were shown to her by appellants, but none on the east side, appellant Charles J. Rousseau assuring her that the corresponding apartments on the east side were the same, and stating that it was inadvisable to enter them while occupied by tenants on account of the disturbance. Upon this appeal we have the exhibits before us, and, with the aid of the floor and elevation plans of the building, it appears that the east side apartments were not and could not be the same as the corresponding apartments on the west side. The evidence shows that respondent knew the width of the lot but does not show that any of the plans were exhibited to her prior to the time that the transaction was consummated. It is claimed by appellant that, as respondent knew the width of the lot and had an opportunity to view the exterior of the building and the apartments on the west side, the representations concerning the apartments on the east side related to matters which were patent and obvious and would therefore not be actionable. In support of their position appellants cite Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 313, 75 P. 899; Beckley v. Archer, 74 Cal. App. 598, 241 P. 422; 12 Cal. Jur. 756, and other authorities. None of the authorities cited are on all fours with the present case, but relate to representations concerning matters which were in fact patent and obvious where the falsity of the representations was readily ascertainable. In our opinion these authorities have no application to the facts in the present case. The subject of the representations here was the size of the east side apartments. These apartments were occupied by tenants and were barred from respondent's view by walls and locked doors. In the absence of an inspection of these apartments, the falsity of these representations could only be determined by respondent by carefully observing all which she had an opportunity to observe and then by correlating all of the facts, including the width of the building, its exterior appearance, the size of the apartments on the west side, and the number and positions of the various windows and other objects. The facts here more closely parallel those in Kaston v. Zimmerman, 192 App. Div. 511, 183 N. Y. S. 615, and Whittemore v. Wilkins, 77 Colo. 533, 238 P. 69. If the apartments on the east side had been actually shown to respondent, the situation would be different, but respondent was told that it was inadvisable to disturb the tenants in order to make an inspection. Under the circumstances, we are of the opinion that respondent was under no duty to demand entry in order to investigate, and was entitled to rely upon the representations made.

[3-6] The next two contentions of appellants relate to the State Housing Act (Stats. 1923, p. 781) and the representations regarding the lobby floor apartments. Appellants contend that the act permits the use of the basement for living and sleeping purposes in addition to three floors above, while respondent contends that the act prohibits a wooden building with more than three stories for such purposes. The conflicting contentions are based upon counsels' interpretations of sections 12 and 27 of the act (pages 794, 801). In our opinion section 12 clearly limits the use of wooden buildings for living or sleeping purposes where it provides: "No wooden apartment house or hotel hereafter erected shall exceed three stories for living or sleeping purposes at any point. * * *" Section 27, which relates to buildings generally, provides: "And no room in a basement of an apartment house or hotel shall hereafter be constructed, altered, or occupied for living or sleeping purposes, unless such room conforms to all of the requirements of this act for rooms in other parts of the building and the ceiling of each such room shall be in all parts not less than seven feet above the adjoining ground level. * * *" We find nothing in section 27 which removes the limitations of section 12 relating to wooden apartment houses, and in our opinion respondent's contention must be sustained. It appears that some doubt existed in the minds of the municipal authorities regarding the proper construction of the act. The health officer testified that, as it had never been decided whether the authorities had the right to order such apartments vacated, it had not been their policy or practice to do so in all cases; that if in their opinion the apartments were sanitary and complied with the other provisions of the act relating to air, ventilation, conveniences, etc., it was their practice to permit them to be occupied. It will thus be seen that as a practical matter the question of whether the apartments had passed inspection resulting in the issuance of a permit by the municipal authorities was of primary importance. Appellants take the position that any representation relating to the legality of the lobby floor apartments was one of law and not actionable. As thus stated there appears to be merit in the claim, but under the allegations of the complaint and the evidence the representation complained of was not solely a representation regarding a matter of law. It was alleged in the complaint that appellants represented to respondent "that said apartment house comprising four floors of apartments, as aforesaid, had been inspected and approved by the municipal authorities of the City and County of San Francisco and that said four floors of apartments had been built according to law and had been approved as legal by said municipal authorities and that defendants had obtained a building permit to build said apartment house comprising said four floors of apartments, as aforesaid." These allegations refer both to a representation of a matter of law and also representations as to facts, to wit, inspection, approval, and permit by the local authorities. At the request of appellants the trial court instructed the jury that, even if they found that appellants made any representations to respondent "to the effect, substantially, that the apartments on the lobby floor had been built according to law, such an opinion * * * would not justify plaintiff in relying upon it and is not a sufficient basis to support a charge of fraudulent misrepresentations." It will thus be seen that the court by its instructions properly withdrew from the consideration of the jury the alleged misrepresentations respecting the legality of the apartments and confined them to a consideration of the alleged misrepresentation of fact concerning inspection, approval, and permit by the municipal authorities. Continuing, appellants claim that respondent's grievance in respect to the lobby apartments, if she has any, springs solely from the existence of the statute, and not from any actual or threatened interference by the municipal authorities. Under this heading appellants point out that the lobby apartments had not actually been vacated as the result of any action on the part of the municipal authorities. It appears that shortly after the respondent became the owner of the property a "First Notice" was addressed to her by the health officer in May, 1927, stating that the basement apartments were being occupied in violation of law, and that the tenants must be given notice to vacate immediately. About one month later in June, 1927, a "Final Notice" was addressed to respondent calling attention to her failure to comply with the previous notice and giving five days' warning of a proceeding against the premises. A third letter followed, in July, 1927, directing respondent to appear at the office of the department of public health regarding these apartments and stating that a failure to comply would result in the full penalty of the law. Respondent testified that the health officer thereafter said that he would allow her to operate the apartments until her "troubles were over with Mr. Rousseau." The records of the department show an entry in August, 1927, as follows: "Two gas stoves (in basement apartment) not vented to outside. Conceded by health officer owing to fact that original builder and owner sold as is to new owner. Issue permit." Two further entries appear, one in April, 1928, reading: "Four-story frame—no permit"; and another April, 1929, reading: "Case in court. No permit." The only permit issued was one dated January, 1929, which by its terms expired April 8, 1929, prior to the second trial of the case. The health officer testified that this permit had apparently come back into his possession through being sent to the wrong address. He further stated that an inspection was made in April, 1929, and at the time of the second trial he had not ruled upon the inspector's report on account of the case being in court. It thus appears that no permit relating to the apartments in question was issued until almost two years after the consummation of the transaction, and that this permit was issued only for a period of approximately three months. The question of whether good faith surrounded the belated issuance of this permit which had expired at time of the trial has been raised by respondent, but we deem it unnecessary to consider this matter. Under the circumstances existing, we believe that respondent's grievance resulted from the misrepresentations regarding approval and permit of the municipal authorities, and not solely from the existence of the statute. The municipal authorities were in doubt regarding the construction to be placed on the act. They issued permits in some cases and not in others, depending upon whether in their opinion the basement apartments were sanitary and complied with the other requirements of the act. If the apartments had been originally built and occupied with full approval of the authorities evidenced by permits from the board of public works and the department of public health, then, no doubt as testified by the witnesses, they would have had greater value in the eyes of a prospective purchaser than apartments built and occupied without any permit whatsoever. With such approval and permits, the question of whether in the opinion of the authorities the apartments were sanitary and complied with the other provisions of the act would have been settled and would have set at rest the uncertainty which existed in this regard. The threatened interference which followed would have been avoided. Without such approval and permits, these questions remained undetermined, threatened interference followed, and the value of the apartment house was thereby lessened.

[7, 8] It is further contended by appellants that there never was any agreement of sale or exchange between appellants and respondent, and that it was therefore error to instruct the jury that the measure of damages was the difference between the actual value of the property and the value of said property had it been as represented. The general rule relating to the measure of damages in such cases is discussed in the case of Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 P. 729, but appellants contend that such measure of damages is not applicable where there is no agreement of sale or exchange between the parties, citing Macdonald v. Roeth, 179 Cal. 194, 176 P. 38. In neither of the cases above mentioned are the facts similar to those in the present case. Here the parties inspected the respective apartment houses involved, and respondent believed that she was exchanging her apartment house for that of appellant. In the transaction respondent actually conveyed her apartment house to appellants, and the latter conveyed the apartment house in question to respondent. It is true that there was no written agreement of sale or exchange signed by respondent and appellants, but it is stated by appellants that the transaction was "tripartite." The evidence shows that R. A. Wilson, through his salesman, Cunningham, was the real estate broker who brought the parties together. Wilson obtained from respondent a written authorization to exchange her apartment house for the apartment house of the appellants upon certain specified terms. He also obtained from appellants a written authorization to sell the apartment house in question upon certain specified terms. Appellants apparently desired to sell rather than exchange, and, without the knowledge of respondent, the transaction was consummated in the following manner: Wilson gave written instructions to the title company which read in part: "This agreement is in conformity with that certain agreement of exchange entered into by Mrs. Grippen, conveying the southwest corner of Gough and Bay street, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which Mr. Rousseau is to accept in exchange, but in lieu thereof reconvey to R. A. Wilson Co., or nominee, for the above stipulated consideration, namely, $26,200.00 cash, and first mortgage of $35,000 upon the Clay street property." Below Wilson's signature appears the following signed by appellant Charles J. Rousseau, "I hereby agree to convey the Clay street property on or before April 1, 1927, in accordance with the terms stipulated above." In our opinion it is not necessary, in order to sustain an action for fraud in the sale or exchange of real property, that there should have been an enforceable written contract between parties prior to the completion of the deal, and we are further of the opinion that under the facts before us the rule governing the measure of damages is the same as in the ordinary case involving an agreement between two parties for the sale or exchange of property, to wit, the difference between the actual value of the property and the value of the property had it been as represented. Hines v. Brode, supra. The agreement, undisclosed to respondent, by which it was provided that respondent's property would be accepted in exchange and conveyed to Wilson for a money consideration, does not alter the situation. Appellants were not strangers to the transaction as was the case in Macdonald v. Roeth, supra. It was their property with which they were dealing and concerning which the representations were made, and it was respondent's property which they received in exchange to deal with as they saw fit.

Further, the contention is made that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that respondent was damaged in the sum of $15,500. Several experts were called by both sides and a great deal of conflicting evidence was introduced on the issue of damage. The various elements affecting value were inquired into at length on examination and cross-examination of the various witnesses of the parties. Applying the rule of damages applicable to the present case and hereinabove discussed, we find ample evidence in the record to sustain the award. In this connection appellants further complain that prejudicial error was committed in admitting certain testimony of witnesses called as experts by respondent. We have examined the several assignments of error made by appellants and find no prejudicial error in the admission of the testimony complained of.

It is also claimed that the court erred in giving and refusing various instructions. The alleged error in many instances involves the question hereinbefore considered. We have examined the entire charge to the jury and believe that it fully presented the issues and the law applicable thereto, and are convinced that no prejudicial error was committed.

[9, 10] We find no merit in appellants' contention relating to alleged prejudicial misconduct on the part of the respondent's counsel based upon a statement made during the opening argument to the jury. A card purporting to contain certain listing information and the date of his first visit to appellants' apartments was produced by the witness Cunningham when called and examined by David Livingston, one of respondent's counsel, on rebuttal in the second trial. The witness stated that after his first visit he had made an office record of listing information which was thereafter transcribed on a card showing the date of such receipt. This card had not been previously produced on the first or second trial, although the witness had been requested to search for the pencil notes of the information which he stated Mr. Rousseau had verbally given him on the first visit. He testified that he had made search, and that the original pencil notes could not be found. Appellants endeavored to throw suspicion about the production of this card. In his opening argument to the jury, Lawrence Livingston, also counsel for respondent, stated to the jury that on May 23 or 24, 1929, he and the witness Cunningham had gone into the basement of R. A. Wilson Company and had there found this card. Appellants' counsel objected to this statement and pointed out that there was no testimony that counsel had been with the witness at the time the witness claimed to have found the card. It appears from the affidavits presented on motion for new trial that Lawrence Livingston had not been in the courtroom at the time the witness testified in rebuttal; that the statement made by him in his argument was made in good faith; that David Livingston, who had examined the witness, immediately upon objection stated that there was no testimony in the record to the effect that that counsel had accompanied the witness; that Lawrence Livingston then withdrew his remark, and that no request was made for any special admonition to the jury regarding this matter. In the general charge to the jury and previously during the trial, the court instructed the jury that statements of the counsel were not evidence in the case. Assuming without deciding that the making of such statement during the argument would constitute misconduct, it does not appear to be prejudicial, nor does it appear that the effect thereof would not have been entirely cured by admonition of the court, if such admonition had been requested. In any event this entire matter was presented to the trial court on motion for new trial. By denying the motion the trial court must be deemed to have concluded that no prejudice resulted, and this conclusion should not be disturbed unless under all the circumstances it is plainly wrong. Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720, 192 P. 538.

[11, 12] It is further urged that the trial court erred in denying appellants' motion to tax costs. By this motion appellants sought among other things to eliminate the costs of the first trial amounting to $355.50. Upon first trial "the court ordered the jury discharged on account of misconduct of counsel for plaintiff and costs of trial charged to plaintiff and cause ordered off calendar." It is conceded that ordinarily the prevailing party is entitled to recover the costs of a previous trial, but it is contended that the rule should be otherwise where a mistrial has resulted from misconduct of counsel for the prevailing party and where the trial court imposes costs upon the prevailing party by way of penalty. We believe this contention must be sustained. Although the order made upon the first trial was not an order from which an appeal might have been taken, it was subject to review upon an appeal from the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956, 963. In our opinion it was not proper for the trial court to review the prior order upon the motion to tax costs and to allow the prevailing party as costs "necessarily incurred" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1033), the costs of the first trial theretofore imposed as a penalty.

[13] In conclusion we may state that the evidence in this case was sharply conflicting on practically all of the material issues. We have been at pains to carefully review the proceedings upon the trial, and in our opinion there was ample evidence to sustain a verdict for either side. The claims of the respective parties were ably presented in a protracted and bitterly contested trial. The issues have been determined adversely to appellants by the triers of the facts, and it is not unusual that they should bend every effort to have the cause tried anew. These considerations, however, are insufficient to justify this court in setting aside the conclusions of the jury and of the trial court on the issues of fact. We have examined the record and the various grounds urged for a reversal, but, for the reasons hereinbefore set forth, we believe that with a modification of the judgment relating to the amount taxed as costs, the judgment and orders appealed from should be affirmed.

The judgment is modified by deducting the sum of $355.50 from the amount taxed as costs, and, as so modified, the judgment and orders appealed from are, and each of them is, affirmed, the parties to bear their respective costs on this appeal.

MONTIJO v. SAMUEL GOLDWYN, INC., OF CALIFORNIA.

Civ. 356.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 28, 1931.

1. Master and servant ⚷5.

Aviator engaged to perform stunt for motion picture held independent contractor, as respects his right to damages.

> Before plaintiff was engaged to take part with airplane belonging to him in stunt which involved airplane and automobile rushing toward each other at rapid speed and airplane avoiding collision by zooming over automobile and just missing it, plaintiff was told by motion picture producer's directors results to be accomplished, and plaintiff then told directors what he would need in performing it, and specified distance airplane would have to travel before it could attain flying speed sufficient to zoom over automobile, and specified maximum rate at which automobile should travel and that it was not to start until airplane had started, and directors exercised no control in planning details of stunt or manner in which it was to be executed.

2. Negligence ⚷105.

Aviator engaged to perform stunt for moving picture, whether independent contractor or employee, assumed risk of damage to airplane incident to contract.

3. Negligence ⚷1.

"Negligence" is absence of ordinary care, omission to do something which reasonably prudent man would do, or doing something which reasonably prudent man would not do (Civ. Code § 1714).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fletcher Bowron, Judge.

Action by John G. Montijo against Samuel Goldwyn, Inc., of California. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

George M. Spicer, of Long Beach, and Elliott H. Barrett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

In 1925 appellant was the owner of a four-passenger cabin airplane of the biplane type. Respondent was engaged in producing moving pictures. In the fall of 1925 respondent was filming a picture known as "Partners Again," one of a "Potash and Perlmutter" series. The plot of the story included an act which involved an airplane and an automobile rushing toward each other at rapid speeds with the airplane avoiding a collision by zooming over the automobile and just missing it. This was characterized as a "stunt" which was intended to give a "thrill" to an audience by the apparent and actual danger to those participating in it.

Respondent engaged appellant to use his airplane in this stunt for a compensation of $100 per day, or $50 an hour if the airplane was out of its hangar for more than two hours on any one day.

Ray Cushman was the owner of a Cadillac automobile of the touring car type. It was generally used for the purpose of transporting moving picture actors and properties from studios to places where scenes were filmed. Samuel Diege conducted an auto rental service in Hollywood under the name of Sammy's Rental Service. He furnished automobiles and drivers to moving picture producers for like transportation purposes. Other than his own automobile, which he occasionally used and drove, he did not own any of the cars working out of his agency, but acted as agent in obtaining business for other owners, such as Cushman, taking 10 per cent. of the charges for his services.

November 20, 1925, was fixed by respondent for filming the "stunt" in Partners Again. Respondent arranged with Samuel Diege to have three automobiles report at its studio in Hollywood to transport the actors and necessary properties to the Municipal Airport at Long Beach. Ray Cushman, Jack Radke, and another driver were assigned to this undertaking by Diege. They reported at the studios of respondent on the morning of November 20th and took the paraphernalia and actors to the airport where appellant was waiting.

Jack Radke was an automobile racing and stunt driver of considerable skill and large experience. He had participated in many dangerous stunts in moving pictures, such as turning his automobile over at high rates of speed, engaging in collisions with other automobiles, and in crossing railroad tracks in front of fast-moving trains in such close proximity to the front of the train that his tail light would appear to be torn off. He was selected to drive the "stunt" automobile over which the airplane was expected to zoom. In this automobile were seated Radke, dressed in a policeman's uniform, an actor also dressed as a policeman, and perhaps two others. The cameras were placed in the tonneau of a second automobile, which, during the first two trials of the stunt was driven by an undisclosed person. The camera car was to follow Radke's car at a distance of twenty-five feet; the cameras photographing the airplane approaching the Radke car and zooming over it.

Cullen Tate was the director in charge of filming this stunt for respondent. He was working under Robert B. McIntyre, who was its production manager. Prior to the 20th day of November McIntyre had explained the details of the story to appellant and had discussed the necessary action with him. On the morning of November 20th, Tate, appellant, Radke, and respondent's head cameraman, together with others, conferred over the details of the stunt. Appellant said that the flying speed of the airplane was between 65 and 70 miles per hour and that he would require from 1000 to 1200 feet in which to attain this speed so that he could zoom over the automobile. The runway at the airport was 1,950 feet long. He directed the stunt automobile to start after the airplane had started and to proceed at a speed of between 30 and 35 miles per hour, which would give him the required two-thirds distance of the runway over which to travel before meeting the automobile. It was arranged that, when the actors and the cameramen were ready, Tate would signal this fact to appellant by waving a white handkerchief, and appellant would then start his airplane and the action would proceed.

On this day the airplane took its position at the west end of the runway facing east, and the automobiles at the east end of the runway facing west. There was a very gentle breeze blowing from the east to the west of the airport. When the cameramen and actors were in their places and ready to perform their duties, Tate gave appellant the agreed signal, and he started his airplane on its course. The automobiles started immediately afterwards and the machines proceeded toward each other at the respective speeds and in the position and manners as arranged by appellant. When the leading automobile was within about 100 feet of the on-coming airplane, Radke lost his nerve, and, thinking that a collision could not be avoided, threw his car to the right and passed out of the picture. The airplane successfully zoomed over the place where the stunt automobile should have been. The action of the picture having been spoiled by Radke, it was necessary to take the scene over again. All of the participants proceeded as before, and the airplane successfully zoomed over the automobile, clearing its top by a very few feet. However the driver of the camera car on this trial swerved his car so that the stunt automobile and the airplane passed out of the field of the cameras and it had to be again retaken. On the third attempt Tate changed the driver of the camera car and put Ray Cushman at the wheel. The third filming of the stunt was a success, though the airplane passed closer to the top of the leading automobile than on the second occasion. Tate desired to refilm the scene to insure a good picture, and directed the action repeated. On the fourth attempt all of the participants executed their parts in accordance with the previous plan. On this occasion the airplane barely cleared the top of the stunt automobile, thus by only a few inches avoiding a serious collision. This ended the filming of the scene for that day.

The films were developed and run in respondent's projection room before Samuel Goldwyn, McIntyre, Tate, and others. They were not satisfied with the picture, for the reason that the cameras, as placed in the second car, were too far from the airplane to give the audience a good idea of the action of the automobile and the airplane rushing toward each other at rapid speeds and the airplane avoiding the collision by starting to zoom over the automobile at about a hundred feet or less in front of it and just clearing its top. For this reason the "thrill," caused by the very evident danger to the occupants of the two machines, was lost to the audience. The representatives of respondent decided to retake the picture and place the cameras in the tonneau of the stunt automobile rather than in a second car. The filming of this scene was fixed for December 1, 1925, and appellant was told to have his airplane in readiness at the Long Beach Airport. Samuel Diege again furnished the automobiles and drivers to transport the actors and properties. He went, driving his own car. Ray Cushman again reported for duty. The driver of the third automobile on this occasion is not identified in the record. When the drivers of the automobiles appeared at the studio on the morning of December 1st, Jack Radke could not be found, and Cushman was asked if he would drive the stunt automobile for an added compensation of $25. He agreed to do this, and was sent to the property room for a policeman's hat and coat. The cameras were lashed in the tonneau of Cushman's car, and the party proceeded to the airport. There they met appellant and briefly went over the details of the stunt. As the wind was blowing from the southwest, appellant chose his position at the east end of the field and that of the automobile at the west end. The day was cloudy, and the filming of the stunt was delayed, during which time the participants had their lunch. After lunch the airplane taxied to its position and the automobile took its position at the other end of the runway. As the light was still poor, the action had to be still further delayed, and the engine of the airplane was stopped for between twenty and forty minutes before it was again started. When the light became better, Tate waved to appellant who thereupon started his engine. The automobile was started, and the two machines rushed toward each other. For some reason the stunt did not work as planned, the automobile and airplane coming into collision a short distance west of the center of the field. The left wheel of the airplane struck the radiator of the automobile between a foot and a half and two feet above the ground. This wheel was torn off as well as the lower left wing of the airplane. The balance of the airplane cleared the automobile and rose over some wires at the end of the field, when it settled and crashed into a brick wall, seriously damaging it. Appellant and his companion escaped without any serious injuries.

Appellant instituted this action to recover for the damage to his airplane and the loss of its use following the accident. After the close of the evidence, the trial court gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to return a verdict in favor of respondent. Appellant appealed from the judgment which was entered upon this verdict. He maintains that the accident was caused by the negligence of Cushman in driving the automobile at a speed in excess of 35 miles per hour so that it traveled more than one-third of the length of the runway and did not give the airplane sufficient space in which to attain its flying speed of from 65 to 70 miles per hour so that it could successfully zoom over the automobile. There is evidence in the record to the effect that the automobile traveled at least 40 miles per hour.

A careful examination of the lengthy transcript would suggest either one, or all, of three explanations for the collision: First, that the airplane engine cooled off during the wait, and therefore could not develop sufficient power to attain its flying speed before reaching the point where it had to zoom over the automobile. Second, that the automobile traveled at too high a rate of speed; therefore not giving the airplane sufficient space in which to attain its flying speed. Third, that atmospheric conditions were different from those on November 20th on account of the clouds and the different heat and density of the air. Any one or all of these conditions might have been contributing factors to the accident.

[1] We have carefully examined the record, and have concluded that, in performing his part of the stunt, appellant was acting as an independent contractor. The airplane belonged to him, and its management, operation, and control were left to him. Neither McIntyre nor Tate knew anything about its operation. Before he was engaged by them, he was told of the results they wished to accomplish and he in turn told them what he would require in performing it. He specified the distance his airplane would have to travel before it could attain flying speed sufficient to zoom over the automobile. He knew the length of the runway at the airport and specified the maximum speed at which the automobile should travel and that it was not to start until after the airplane had started. It clearly appears from the evidence that respondent and its representatives were only interested in the results to be obtained by the stunt, and that the means whereby this result was to be accomplished were left entirely to appellant. The representatives of respondent exercised no control over either the planning of the details of the stunt or the manner in which it was to be executed, which rendered appellant an independent contractor. Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 78 P. 337. It is true that Tate gave appellant a signal before the stunt started. This signal merely informed him that the cameramen were ready to film the action, and can in no manner be construed as control over the details of the operation of either the automobile or the airplane.

The evidence strongly indicates that Ray Cushman was acting as an independent contractor and not as an employee of respondent on December 1, 1925. His employment divided itself into two separate contracts: First, he was employed through Samuel Diege to transport actors and materials from respondent's studio to the airport. He did this in his own automobile without supervision by respondent except as to the time of departure and the place of arrival. The manner of the operation of his automobile during the trip, together with the route to be taken, were left entirely to him. In this part of his employment there can be no question but that he was acting as an independent contractor. Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 404, 216 P. 578, 43 A. L. R. 1304; Stephens v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 261, 215 P. 1025. His second contract of employment on December 1st was the driving of his automobile in the stunt for which he received $25 from respondent. He had been present during the four trials held on November 20th, and had driven his automobile in two of these trials. He had also heard appellant give Radke instructions as to the operation of the automobile. It is true that on the day of the accident Tate told him to drive his automobile between 30 and 35 miles per hour after the airplane started. In doing this Tate merely repeated the former instructions given by appellant to Radke which probably had been heard by Cushman. As far as the record discloses, the agents of respondent did not plan any of the details of the operation of either the airplane or the automobile during the filming of the stunt. This was done by appellant.

[2] That the stunt was inherently dangerous appears from the testimony of all of the participants in it as well as that of other aviators called as witnesses. Appellant recognized this danger in his first negotiations with McIntyre. He asked that respondent assume the risk for any damage done the airplane, which respondent did not do. When the success or failure of an undertaking of this kind depends, first, upon the elements of nature, second, upon the operation of highly intricate machines such as an airplane and an automobile, and, third, upon inconstant human factors controlling the exactness and precision of the operation of these machines, and when a change in any one of these three things might result in serious consequences, it would be apparent to any one that a collision with consequent damage and injury would almost surely result from the frequent repetition of the act. Just when this injury would come would depend upon the failure of one of these three factors to function properly and with the exact precision that the success of the maneuver required. Neither appellant nor any one else could reasonably expect exact precision in the operation of each of the three elements on repeated occasions. The fact that the accident did not occur during one of the four trials on November 20th could be attributed more to good luck than to any other cause. In making his contract with respondent, appellant should and probably did take these risks into consideration and fix his compensation at a sum commensurate with them. He should be held to have assumed the risks of damage to his airplane which were incident to his contract.

[3] Negligence is defined as an absence of ordinary care (section 1714, Civ. Code); as the omission to do something which a reasonably prudent man would do, or the doing of something which a reasonably prudent man would not do in the conduct of his affairs. Jamison v. San Jose, etc., Co., 55 Cal. 593. The statement of these rules and their application to the facts of this case immediately leads us to the conclusion that appellant must be charged with negligence in undertaking and carrying out the dangerous stunt in which he participated on November 20th and on December 1, 1925. We do not believe that an aviator exercising ordinary prudence and care would engage in an undertaking of this kind without the reasonable expectation of incurring serious injury to himself and his airplane. The very dangerous nature of the stunt makes the probability of such injuries imminent, and, because of the probability of an accident following the undertaking, the fact of participating in it must be considered as the proximate cause of the ensuing damages. If the negligence of appellant was the proximate cause of the consequent damages, he cannot recover. Lammers v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 186 Cal. 379, 199 P. 523.

"Contributory negligence has been defined as 'such an act or omission on the part of the plaintiff amounting to a want of ordinary care, as concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of the defendant, is the proximate cause of the injury complained of.' Merely because one person is at fault does not dispense with the duty of another to use ordinary care, so that if a plaintiff—other than an employee in an action against his employer—is guilty of contributory negligence as above defined, he may not recover." 19 Cal. Jur. 644.

If we assume that Ray Cushman was an employee of respondent in driving the automobile during the stunt on December 1, 1925, and not an independent contractor, and that as such an employee he was negligent in driving the automobile at a speed of more than 35 miles per hour, still we must hold that the negligence of appellant in participating in such a dangerous undertaking contributed to the accident and consequently barred his recovery.

Judgment affirmed.

CAMPBELL v. EAGLE INDEMNITY CO. et al.

Civ. 6690.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.
March 31, 1931.

Insurance ⚿145(3).

Holder of burglary policy for twelve months' term could not recover for loss sustained after end of year, where agent who received renewal premium had ceased to be company's broker.

By terms of "Three Year Agreement Endorsement" on policy, the insurance company agreed to renew the policy on the expiration of the 12 months' term on payment of specified premium, and policy further provided that the insured should remit each year to the company through its agent and renew the policy by certificate. Insured paid the renewal premium to the former agent of the insurance company, but received no renewal certificate.

Action by Charles W. Campbell against the Eagle Indemnity Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

John M. Bowen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Karl Lobdell and H. L. Watt, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The appellant was insured by respondent company against loss by burglary of his residence. Having suffered such a loss, he instituted an action upon the policy of insurance. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed.

The case comes to us upon stipulated facts and the judgment roll. By a policy of insurance issued in December, 1924, upon which a premium was paid for the period of one year, it was recited that the same should cover loss or damage occurring "within the policy term defined in statement 13 of the schedule or within any extension thereof under renewal certificate issued by the company." In the year 1925 a renewal certificate was issued upon payment to Price by appellant of the premium for a second year. In January, 1927, appellant paid the requisite premium to Price, who receipted for the same. It is stipulated that "the sum of $26.17 for said third premium was not and no part thereof, was at any time paid to Eagle Indemnity Company, or its general agents, or any other person, firm or corporation, and Eagle Indemnity Company at no time issued any renewal certificate on said policy other than the renewal certificate above referred to, which extended said policy to December 19, 1926." Appellant's residence was burglarized during the month of November, 1927. Sworn statements were regularly filed by the insured with said company, and demand was made for reimbursement, which was refused. By the terms of its "Three Year Agreement Endorsement" the company stipulated that it "hereby agrees to renew this policy at date of expiration for a term of twelve months, beginning at noon on the 19th day of December, 1925, on payment of a premium of $39.26 and also at date of expiration of the second term of twelve months to renew for a further term of twelve months, beginning at noon of the 19th day of December, 1926, on payment of a premium of $26.17. The insured by the acceptance of this policy agrees to accept the renewals above referred to, and to pay the premiums therefor, but neither this agreement on the part of the company nor that made by the insured shall be held to abrogate the right of the parties to cancel this policy or either of the renewals at any time in accordance with the policy conditions." There is nothing tending to indicate that the policy had been terminated by either party, nor that the insured was advised of the insurer having severed Price's commission as a broker, although Campbell received no renewal certificate to December, 1927, for which he had paid Price the premium as provided by the policy, ten months before the date of the loss. And the record is equally silent as to knowledge on the part of the insurer of payment of the last premium as an expression of intention to renew the policy.

There is much argument as to the ostensible authority of Price, and the obligations of insurance companies upon payment of premiums to their authorized agents under the provisions of regular three-year contracts of insurance. But we think it beside the question inasmuch as the express conditions of the one-year policy with privilege of renewal as above recited are plain and specific. Upon acceptance of the policy the insured agrees that he will renew with the insurer, but by the mere issuance of the policy it does not follow that the latter insures for a period longer than one year, unless the insured shall remit each year in accordance with the "Three Year Agreement Endorsement" to the company through its agent or otherwise, and renew the same by a certificate "countersigned by a duly authorized official or agent of the company and attached to policy." One of the significant provisions of the contract between the parties provides that "the term of the policy is twelve months." Authorities cited by appellant wholly relate to contracts concededly executed or renewed, wherein the broker's authority was questioned. We are cited to no case in this state which is of assistance. In Raynor v. Nat. Casualty Co., 125 Misc. Rep. 174, 210 N. Y. S. 586, was presented a policy which was dated June 20, 1922, which "by its terms extends from noon of that day until noon of August 1, 1922, 'and for such further time as may be stated in the renewal receipts.'" A judgment in favor of the plaintiff was reversed upon the ground that the interpretation by the trial court "consists in disregarding the fact that this is not a case of a policy issued for a long term, like a year or more, with a requirement of say monthly payments during the time on the 1st of each month, and the provision that in case of default the policy might or should be voided, or substantially a situation of the possibility of the policy being canceled by the nonperformance of a condition subsequent. This policy ended by its very terms on August 1, 1922, and after that time there was by virtue of the added provision, 'and for such further time as may be stated in the renewal receipts,' a continuing offer by the company to renew the same whenever the assured by an additional premium accepted the offer, and for such additional time as might be stated in the corresponding receipt." Like provisions have received a similar construction in other jurisdictions. Nat. L. & A. Ins. Co. v. Reams (Tex. Civ. App.) 197 S. W. 332; Steele v. Great E. C. & I. Co., 158 Minn. 160, 197 N. W. 101.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Marguerite Wilson against Emil Kestenholz. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

McFadden & Holden and Leo J. Friis, all of Anaheim, for appellant.

Albert Launer and Harold A. McCabe, both of Fullerton, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

The defendant has appealed from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff by the superior court of Orange county for damages, and has assigned as his principal ground for reversal an asserted insufficiency of evidence.

It was agreed that, while driving an automobile in a southerly direction on West street in the city of Anaheim, the defendant struck the plaintiff, who was walking ahead of him in the same direction. The latter swore that she was at all times walking on the "soft dirt," about one and one-half feet to two feet to the right and parallel with an oiled pavement which was between sixteen and eighteen feet wide, constituting the main thoroughfare for motor vehicles. She testified positively that she was at no time on the pavement, that she heard an automobile approaching behind her, but that no signal was given. The defendant testified that he was driving on the pavement, that he saw the plaintiff about fifteen feet in front of his car, and that he did not change his course nor depart from the regular macadamized surface. The trial court found, however, that the defendant was driving "in a negligent, careless and unlawful manner," which caused the plaintiff to be thrown to the ground, as a result of which she suffered serious injuries. As conclusions of law, it is recited that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of said injuries and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

[1-3] Appellant contends that, having testified that he did not change his course while proceeding in a southerly direction along the paved highway, the court erred in finding that he was negligent, and in failing to find that the plaintiff did change her course and step in front of the approaching machine. But it requires slight, if any, reference to the authorities for refutation of such theory under the circumstances of the case presented. It has been held under similar circumstances that the pedestrian is plainly visible to the driver, and is under no legal obligation to anticipate danger or to look back, whereas the latter is bound not only to give reasonable warning, but also to exercise every reasonable precaution to insure safety. "In the exercise of 'every reasonable precaution' which the law enjoins, it is well within the spirit of the law to say that the driver of an automobile approaching pedestrians, and particularly women, must have his car under such control as that it may be promptly stopped." Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 P. 743, 747. The court is not bound by the testimony of any single witness, but may reject part or all of his testimony and accept that of any other witness which seems more probable under all of the evidence adduced. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513. And an appellate court will not attempt to judge the credibility of witnesses nor to question the judgment below, except where the record demonstrates that in the very nature of things certain testimony cannot be true. Badover v. Guaranty Tr. & Svgs. Bank, 186 Cal. 775, 200 P. 638. That this is not such a case is at once apparent. We find no error.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Rene A. May, executor of the last will and testament of Alfred May, deceased, filed his first and final account and petitions for final distribution, opposed by Miriam K. May, deceased's widow. From an order for discontinuance of family allowance, from an order of ratable distribution, and from a decree of settlement of final account and final distribution, Miriam K. May appeals.

Affirmed.

Joseph E. Bien and Werner Olds, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the widow from an order for discontinuance of family allowance, from an order for ratable distribution, and from a decree of settlement of final account and final distribution in the matter of the estate of Alfred May, deceased. Appellant in her briefs has ignored the appeal from the first and second order, and accordingly we will confine our attention to the third point.

The decedent, Alfred May, was married to his first wife, Henriette F., in 1889, and immediately thereafter moved to Mexico, where he eventually engaged in business under the firm name of May Hermanos y Compania. Four children were born as the result of this marriage. About 1913, with his wife, Henriette F., he left Mexico and came to California, but did not engage in business. His income was derived entirely from his interest in May Hermanos, and from investments, most of which were in Mexican corporations. On January 3, 1925, Henriette May died intestate, a resident of San Francisco, leaving surviving her husband, Alfred May, now deceased, and the four children before mentioned. Subsequent to the death of their mother, Henriette F. May, the four children executed to Alfred May, their father, an assignment of all their interest wherever situate in the estate of Henriette F. May. This assignment was never used. On March 31, 1926, Alfred May, the deceased, married Miriam K. Streckler, now Miriam K. May, the appellant, and on April 19, 1927, he died leaving surviving his widow, Miriam K. May, and the four children by his first marriage. On May 12, 1927, the last will and testament of Alfred May was admitted to probate in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and under the terms of said will the widow and four children each are bequeathed one-fifth of the entire estate of Alfred May, deceased. By said last will and testament, Rene A. May, a son by the first marriage, is named sole executor to act without bonds, and after due proceedings qualified as such executor. The executor filed his first and final account and the petition for final distribution. Appellant filed objections. After a hearing, the court settled the account and decreed final distribution. Thereafter appellant appealed to this court from the said decree of final distribution.

It appears from the inventory and appraisement that the assets of the estate of Alfred May include an "interest of the decedent in May Hermanos y Compania, a partnership engaged in business in Hermosillo, State of Sonora, Republic of Mexico, amounting to approximately $55,812, subject to whatever interest therein may be determined by the Mexican courts to be vested in the estate of the late Henriette May now being probated in the Mexican courts, appraised at $55,812.00." And it appears from the first and final account filed by the executor that "the appraisers of the said estate in valuing the items of the claim of the decedent against May Hermanos y Compania appraised the said claim at the full amount of $55,812.00, whereas the said executor is of the opinion that only half of the said claim is the property of the estate of the decedent, and the remaining one-half thereof, as said executor is informed and believes, is the property of the estate of the late Henriette F. May, the first wife of the decedent, whose estate is now being probated in the State of Sonora, Republic of Mexico." It further appears from the first and final account that "the claims of the decedent against May Hermanos y Compania and Compania Industrial del Pacifico are not now payable, but are payable over a period of years, and the said claims can be readily collected by the distributees of the estate of the said decedent as in these probate proceedings, and there is no necessity of continuing these probate proceedings for the collection thereof." The inventory and appraisement also contains the following: "Note. Various parcels of real property, situate in the Republic of Mexico, in which the decedent had an interest, one of the said parcels of real property being under a contract of sale to one Emilio Beraud, are not listed in the foregoing inventory because not within the jurisdiction of the State of California."

[1] Appellant contends that the evidence did not show what the community property law of Mexico was, and that the court was bound in its decree of distribution to apply the provisions of the California law in this case. Certain Mexican statutes were discussed during the hearing, and, from the transcript, we conclude that counsel for appellant knew and understood the law of Mexico, and from the briefs that, if the Mexican statutes were properly before the court, there was no misapplication of such statutes to the order of distribution. Likewise, respondent concedes that, if the case were to be considered solely in the light of the California law, the interests of Henriette F. May, the first wife, in the community property, would have vested in her husband on her death, and that the partnership would have been dissolved by the death of Alfred May. We have therefore, as the first question to consider: Did the court upon the hearing have the right to apply the Mexican provisions of the community property law to the facts as presented? If any provision of this law was introduced, then the court had the right to consider any or all of the Mexican laws upon this subject which might appear in the volume of laws introduced. See Ex parte Spears, 88 Cal. 643, 26 P. 608, 22 Am. St. Rep. 341. The certificate of the judge who presided at the hearing is attached to the reporter's transcript, and he certifies that the Political Constitution of the United States of Mexico, published by Herrero Hermanos, Sucesores, in 1920, was introduced, and that there was read into the evidence paragraph II of article 121 of the Constitution; also the Law of Family Relations of Mexico. The laws are quoted in the Spanish language, and translations given with a statement that the translations were vouched for by a witness produced for the executor. The transcript of testimony does not disclose that any objection was interposed to the method of introduction. Upon examination of witness, counsel for appellant propounded questions which indicated that he knew the laws of Mexico, and evidently accepted the translations as correct. The right of the court to consider the Mexican statutes upon this subject need not be considered further, except to say that the decree of distribution was in accordance with such provisions.

[2, 3] Appellant contends that the court erred in distributing the claim of the estate against May Hermanos y Compania to the heirs instead of requiring the executor to collect the same and account therefor in the estate of Alfred May pending in the city and county of San Francisco. The executor of the Alfred May estate in San Francisco is also the executor of the estate of Alfred May in Mexico; likewise he is the administrator of the estate of Henriette F. May pending in Mexico. Appellant relies upon the decision in the case of In re Ortiz' Estate, 86 Cal. 306, 24 P. 1034, 21 Am. St. Rep. 44. Caledonio Ortiz was a resident of California, and died leaving property in Spain, Mexico, and California. The executor collected and took possession of all that part of the assets of the estate which were then in Spain and converted all the personal property into money. He then came to California and was appointed and qualified as executor of the Ortiz estate. In due course of time, the executor filed his final account, but did not charge himself with the assets collected from Spain. Objections were filed, and, after a hearing thereon, the court charged the executor with an amount found to be the residuum of the Spanish assets after deducting expenses, charges, and demands against the Spanish estate. The court found that the executor could have had the residuum with which he was charged transferred to him in this state before the filing of his final account. The proceeds of the estate were actually on deposit in a bank in Spain. There was no question in the Ortiz Case but that the Spanish tribunal would credit the executor with all that he was required to account for and distribute in California. Under these facts, the California court had the right to demand an accounting of the foreign assets, and the Supreme Court so held. However, an executor cannot be held answerable when he cannot compel the collection of foreign assets upon his domestic appointment. "Whether, then, the principal or domiciliary representative be required pro forma, or not, to include in his inventory assets which come to his knowledge, either situate in the state or county of principal and domiciliary jurisdiction, or out of it, his liability as to assets of the latter sort depends somewhat upon his means of procuring them, and the fact of an ancillary administration in the situs of such assets." In re Ortiz, 86 Cal. page 315, 24 P. 1034, 1036, 21 Am. St. Rep. 44. The court of the domicile has the right to punish an executor upon refusal or neglect to account for foreign assets that are collectible. The California court could not punish the California executor of the Alfred May estate because, whatever interest or profits up to date there may be from May Hermanos y Compania are claimed by the estate of Henriette F. May pending in Mexico. Under the laws of Mexico as introduced in evidence, personal property as well as real property is governed by the law of the situs. Under the circumstances it would have been futile to make an order that would not be binding in Mexican jurisdiction. Assuming that the trial court had jurisdiction over the executor in Mexico in the Alfred May estate by reason of his domiciliary executorship in California, and that the court here ordered a contest to determine the rights of the respective estates, such contest would of necessity be brought in Mexico. The court found that whatever money the respondent executor had received for the estate of Alfred May had been accounted for. There was no evidence to the contrary.

After the death of Henriette F. May, the children heirs executed a so-called assignment of their interest in her estate to their father, the deceased herein. Appellant contends that the trial court sitting in probate passed upon the validity of this alleged assignment. The assignment was executed, but was never accepted and never presented for use in Mexico. In the decree of settlement of the final account and of final distribution, there is a reference to this instrument, but the court did not make a finding thereon.

[4] Further objection is made that respondent had no authority to extend the time of payments of a debt of, or to make himself, as executor, a copartner in, May Hermanos y Compania. Under the California law an executor of an estate of a deceased partner, by reason of his position of executor, has no power to extend the partnership or to do anything else which would create the partnership anew, but this agreement was in fulfillment of the original articles of copartnership, and the respondent acted in his capacity as executor in Mexico. The surviving partners had a right to insist that the interest of the decedent should be liquidated in the manner provided in the original articles. Under the original articles the heirs are "obliged to leave in the possession of the copartnership or of the person or persons which may legally succeed the same, the amount of their interest in the copartnership capital and profits for the term of five years."

The interest of the decedent in the copartnership in the Beraud contract, also objected to by appellant, would not be binding on the Mexican company, on Beraud, or on the children of Henriette F. May, and the court properly declined to fix the amount, but decreed to each heir an undivided fifth interest.

Judgment affirmed.

Civ. 7451.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

March 17, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 16, 1931.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 15, 1931.

1. Damages ⚷192.

Plaintiff's testimony, in action for injuries caused by fright when she saw truck collide with street car and head toward her store, held to warrant inference that she was frightened for her own safety as well as truck driver's.

2. Pleading ⚷207.

Complaint alleging permanent physical damage because of truck entering plaintiff's storeroom after collision with street car held sufficient to charge that injury was proximately caused by collision, in absence of special demurrers.

3. Witnesses ⚷208(2).

Refusal to compel physician, who examined plaintiff in personal injury suit, to testify for defendant, held reversible error (Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4, provides that physician cannot be examined in civil action as to information acquired in attending patient, without latter's consent, but that action to recover damages for personal injuries shall be deemed consent by plaintiff that any physician who prescribed for or treated plaintiff shall testify.

4. Witnesses ⚷28(2).

Physician is entitled only to statutory witness fee, in absence of express contract to pay him extra compensation for expert testimony.

5. Trial ⚷45(1).

Statement that defendants were simply trying to bring before jury all testimony they could as to plaintiff's condition held sufficient offer of proof to authorize admission of attending physician's testimony.

6. Appeal and error ⚷1048(1).

Refusal to compel physician to testify as to his examination of plaintiff in personal injury suit held prejudicial to defendant.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs and respondents sued appellant Lewald Coal Company and the city and county of San Francisco for damages for personal injuries. The evidence showed that on April 2, 1928, a truck belonging to appellant Lewald Coal Company and a street car of defendant city and county of San Francisco came into collision at the intersection of Ashton avenue and Ocean avenue in San Francisco. The result of the impact was that the truck was propelled easterly on Ocean avenue and into the front of a building occupied by respondent Peggy Webb as a millinery store. Peggy Webb testified that she saw the collision and the approach of the truck to the building from the mezzanine floor and immediately after the impact, and as a result of the nervous shock attendant thereon, collapsed and had ever since suffered from extreme nervousness, headaches, sleeplessness, loss of weight, and other nervous disturbances. The jury returned a verdict against both defendants. A new trial was granted to the city and county of San Francisco, but denied to Lewald Coal Company, and the latter prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] The first question presented rests upon the claim of appellant that under the testimony of Peggy Webb she was put in fear solely for the safety of the driver of the truck and not for her own safety, and that physical injury caused by fear for the safety of another will not support a recovery for tort. We do not think that the record fairly construed supports appellant's construction of the evidence. It is true that respondent Peggy Webb testified explicitly that she felt sure the driver of the truck would be killed and when she knew that he was not killed "it was better." It is likewise true that she did not testify explicitly that she was put in fear for her own safety, but she did give this significant testimony: "I got there just as the two came together in the street, the street car and the automobile, and then the machine turned away from the street car; it was a terriffic crash then, but he turned away from the street car and headed right straight at us; and we were standing—I was standing and Orlean was seated right at the window, and there was no place to get to, we had to stand and take it, so we just stood and watched him come; it was a great big truck, completely loaded with coal, there wasn't room for any more, and he headed just straight at us, and he went out of sight under my feet; I felt sure the driver would be killed, felt sure he would be killed. * * * And I was frightened, I couldn't move then; finally I collapsed, and my legs wouldn't hold me up. I sat on the floor. I couldn't move." We are satisfied that the fair inference from this evidence is that respondent was frightened for her own safety as well as for that of the driver. Lindley v. Knowlton, 179 Cal. 298, 302, 176 P. 440. It therefore becomes unnecessary for us to decide the question of law urged by appellant on this point. Some complaint is made, under this head, of the allegations of the complaint, but so far as the record shows no demurrer was interposed and no objection made to the introduction of evidence on this ground. The complaint charges "that because and on account of said motor car so entering the said storeroom of said plaintiff, as aforesaid, the said Peggy Webb then and there suffered and sustained and ever since the said 2d day of April, 1928, has and still does suffer and sustain permanent physical pain, suffering and damage," etc. In the absence of a special demurrer, we hold that the complaint sufficiently charges that the physical injury was proximately caused by the collision.

[3] On cross-examination of respondent Peggy Webb it was developed that she had been examined by Dr. Joseph Catton, a physician. Plaintiffs did not produce Dr. Catton as a witness and he was subpœnaed by defendants. When called to the stand he refused to give any testimony concerning his examination of Peggy Webb or his conclusions therefrom. The doctor's position is made plain by the following statement which he made: "It is not the financial arrangement for my time, Mr. Heidelberg, alone; it is a matter that a doctor is called upon to make a decision when it is an equitable thing for him to give that testimony; by that I mean my office is not a very sacred place if a patient or a lawyer may send a case to me and pay for an opinion and then if I do not happen to be used in that particular case in a certain particular way that he would have the opportunity to come into court and say 'Don't go to Joe Catton because if he doesn't go with you he is available to the other side for a fee.'"

After an extended discussion in which court, counsel, and the witness participated, the court ruled that Dr. Catton could not be compelled to testify. This ruling of the court in our opinion constituted reversible error. However commendable may have been the ethical objections of Dr. Catton from a professional standpoint, and we can sympathize thoroughly with him in his stand, the policy of the law as declared by the Legislature required the doctor to set aside his scruples and testify concerning those matters about which he had learned from his professional examination of Mrs. Webb. The pertinent portions of section 1881, subdivision 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure provide: "A licensed physician or surgeon can not, without the consent of his patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient, which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient; * * * provided, further, that where any person brings an action to recover damages for personal injuries, such action shall be deemed to constitute a consent by the person bringing such action that any physician who has prescribed for or treated said person and whose testimony is material in said action shall testify."

[4] The position of the trial court that Dr. Catton could not be compelled to testify unless arrangements were made to compensate him as an expert witness would in effect nullify this quoted section in many cases. All that Dr. Catton need do, if the trial court was correct, to keep from the stand would be to demand such an amount for testifying as would be impracticable for defendants to pay. Such is not the law. "The authorities, however, all agree that, in the absence of an express contract to pay a physician for his testimony as an expert, he is only entitled to the statutory fee. The uniform rule seems to be that a physician who has acquired knowledge of a patient or of specific facts in connection with the patient may be called upon to testify to those facts without any compensation other than the ordinary witness receives for attendance upon court. In those states recognizing the right to extra compensation for a physician who testifies as an expert it is uniformly held that, where such testimony is sought to be elicited without requiring any particular investigation on the part of the physician, he is required to testify without extra compensation." McClenahan v. Keyes, 188 Cal. 574, 583, 206 P. 454, 458.

[5] Respondent claims that there was no sufficient offer of proof to present this question to the appellate court. Defendants stated in this behalf: "We are simply trying to bring out before the jury all the testimony we can as to this lady's condition. We ascertained Dr. Catton examined the lady; they did not call Dr. Catton and I subpoenaed Dr. Catton." In the nature of things this was the only offer defendants could make. They did not know what Dr. Catton's testimony would be and could not state what they could not know. The reason for the rule ceasing, the rule itself ceases. The situation was not unlike that existing in cross-examination where it has been said: "A party can hardly be expected to know what his adversary's witness will testify to on cross-examination, nor could he well state to the court what he expected to elicit by such examination." Harness v. State, 57 Ind. 1, 8; State v. Martino, 27 N. M. 1, 192 P. 507, 509; Cunningham v. Austin & N. W. R. Co., 88 Tex. 534, 31 S. W. 629; Martin v. Elden, 32 Ohio St. 282.

[6] It is folly to urge that it does not appear that appellant was prejudiced by the ruling. Appellant was deprived of the opportunity of showing whether it was injured or not. The language of our Supreme Court in denying a petition for hearing in People v. Stevenson, 103 Cal. App. 82, 93, 284 P. 487, 492, seems particularly appropriate to the facts of this case: "The constitutional provisions impose the burden of showing prejudice or injury by a ruling which is within the power of the complaining party to present. It does not contemplate a situation where such party without fault has been denied an opportunity to determine whether or not he has been prejudically injured."

Appellant was entitled to present the testimony of Dr. Catton. It was denied that right and by that denial it was put out of its power to show to this court what Dr. Catton's testimony would have been. Under such circumstances prejudice must be presumed. In a case very similar in its facts to this, the Supreme Court of Washington reached the same conclusion that we have here. State v. Superior Court, 154 Wash. 144, 281 P. 335.

[7] The objection to Mrs. Webb's testimony of her earnings prior to the alleged injury in our opinion goes only to its weight, not to its admissibility. The instructions based on the Motor Vehicle Act correctly stated the law, and we cannot say that the jury might not as reasonable persons find that the failure to comply with the law in those particulars was a proximate cause of the collision.

Judgment reversed.

BEALL v. ERICKSON.

Civ. 328.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

1. New trial ⚷165.

When motion for new trial is once acted on, order cannot be vacated and entire matter again considered.

2. Courts ⚷116(1).

If order entered respecting new trial is not order made by court, record may be corrected to speak truth.

3. Courts ⚷116(6).

Order amending order granting new trial held intended to correct inadvertence of clerk and to make records set forth true situation.

> It follows that the amending order must be taken as the correct order as originally made by the court. The first order of the trial court merely ordered that motion for new trial be granted, and the subsequent order stated: "Through inadvertence the order heretofore made granting a new trial in the above-entitled action, the grounds were not stated and it is therefore ordered that said order be and it is hereby amended nunc pro tunc as of April 29, 1930, to read: 'It is ordered that plaintiff's motion for a new trial herein be and it is hereby granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict rendered in the action.'" utes respecting granting of new trial was proper one.

> It was argued that, since the transcript was certified as correct, it must be taken to be so, and that no presumptions could then be indulged. However, from the transcript before the court, nothing appeared in connection with the order for new trial except the two minute orders, and, while the record showed that what was done by inadvertence in one was corrected in the other, it did not show whose was the inadvertence or omission.

5. New trial ⚷6.

Broad discretion is vested in trial court in passing on motion for new trial.

6. New trial ⚷71.

Where trial judge is dissatisfied with verdict, and believes it clearly against weight of evidence, he may set it aside, even though there be substantial evidence supporting it.

> In such case, he may grant a new trial, notwithstanding a conflict in the testimony, even though on same conflict appellate court would be bound by verdict, and, even if there be no conflict in the testimony, the probative force and effect of the evidence is ultimately for the determination of the trial judge on hearing of motion for new trial.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial in an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence in the operation of an automobile. The answer, in addition to denying the allegations of the complaint, alleged contributory negligence. The jury brought in a verdict for the defendant, and a motion for a new trial was argued and submitted and later granted. The original judgment was entered on March 24, 1930. The minutes of the court under date of April 29, 1930, show the following: "Plaintiff's motion for a new trial herein having been heretofore argued and submitted to the court for its decision, and after due consideration and the court being fully advised, it is ordered that said motion be, and it is hereby granted."

The minutes further show under date of May 1, 1930, the following: "Through inadvertence the order heretofore made granting a new trial in the above-entitled action, the grounds were not stated and it is therefore ordered that said order be and it is hereby amended nunc pro tunc as of April 29, 1930, to read: 'It is ordered that plaintiff's motion for a new trial herein be and it is hereby granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict rendered in the action.'"

[1-3] The principal question raised on this appeal is as to the effect of this minute order of May 1, 1930; that is, whether or not the order granting a new trial is to be here treated as having been made upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. It is well settled that, when a motion for a new trial has been once acted upon by the trial court, the order made cannot be later vacated and the entire matter again considered. Coombs v. Hibberd, 43 Cal. 452; Dorland v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 484, 6 P. 135. It is equally well settled that, if an order entered is not the order made by the court, the records may be so corrected as to make them speak the truth. Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 P. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491. That the amended order of May 1 did just this is contended by respondent. On the other hand, appellant contends that it must be taken as changing the original order made on April 29. Appellant insists that the instant case is similar to Drinkhouse v. Van Ness, 202 Cal. 359, 260 P. 869, 873, in which case the court said: "But the trial court has no authority, under the guise of an amendment, to correct a judicial error, or make of record an order that was never made. Kaufman v. Shain, 111 Cal. 16, 19, 52 Am. St. Rep. 139, 43 P. 393. Yet the record indicates that is precisely what was attempted to be done in the present case. The later order does not purport to correct the entry of the first, neither is there anything on its face or in the record from which it may be gathered that such was its purpose. It stands out clearly as an order purporting to 'amend,' that is, to change, an order previously made."

We have examined the original briefs in that action, and it appears that the court was

---

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

there discussing a very different situation. In that case an order had been entered on May 1, 1902, the essential part reading as follows: "It is ordered that the said motion be and the same is hereby granted." On May 8, 1902, the following order was entered:

"In this action it is ordered that the order of May 1st, 1902, be and the same is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Motion of Defendant Frank Van Ness for new trial be denied and motion for new trial of intervener be granted."

It thus appears that, by the second of these orders, the first order was very materially changed. In Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 209 P. 892, 895, the court said: "On an appeal from an order granting a new trial the action of the trial court will not be disturbed if upon any hypothesis it can be sustained. Its action is conclusive upon this court, unless an abuse of discretion is made to appear."

A number of cases have been cited by respondent wherein orders have been approved which corrected previous orders passing upon motions for a new trial. Appellant argues that in every such case cited the order of amendment contains recitals which show that the previous minute order did not correctly set forth the order actually made by the court. This does not conclusively appear, however, in the case of Brush v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 58 Cal. App. 501, 208 P. 997, 998. In that case, two minute orders appear as follows: "The first, that of March 18, 1921, reads: 'Defendant's motion for a new trial is granted.' The second, dated March 28, 1921, is as follows: 'It appearing that in the minute entry of the order granting a new trial on the 18th day of March, 1921, the statement of the grounds on which said order was made was inadvertently omitted, and for the purpose of correcting said inadvertent omission, said order is hereby amended and corrected, nunc pro tunc, as of March 18, 1921, to read as follows: Defendant's motion for a new trial is hereby granted, on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, in that it appears from the preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence."

Essentially, the amending order in that case was like the one now before us. Both amending orders refer to original orders appearing in the minutes, and in neither case does it appear that reference is made to any verbal order or to anything other than the original minute order entered. In the case before us, the amending order states that, through inadvertence in the original order, the grounds were not stated. In the Brush Case, the amending order states that in the original order the grounds for the order were inadvertently omitted. While the order in the Brush Case states that it is being made for the purpose of correcting an inadvertent omission, it leaves the matter in doubt, whether the inadvertence was that of the judge in making the order or that of the clerk in entering it. In the case before us, it is made plain that the second order is made for the purpose of correcting an inadvertence, and, as in the Brush Case, a doubt is left as to whether it is the inadvertence of the judge or of the clerk. In the Brush Case the appellant made the same contention as is made by the appellant here, that the inadvertence referred to was judicial and not clerical; and therefore that the second minute entry was unauthorized and void. In passing upon that contention, the court said:

"Appellant's claim that the lower court exceeded its authority in entering the nunc pro tunc order of March 28, 1921, is based upon the assumption that the omission from the original minute entry of any statement that the new trial was granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence was a judicial and not a clerical error; that is, it is gratuitously assumed by appellant that, when the trial judge announced that a new trial would be granted, who made no mention of the ground upon which it was ordered, and that therefore the failure of the first minute entry to specify that the new trial was granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict was not a mistake of the clerk but an error of the judge. Aside from the two minute entries, there is nothing whatever in the record on appeal to show any of the circumstances under which either entry was made. There is nothing in the record on appeal to show that, in ordering the new trial, the trial judge did not specifically direct the clerk to specify in his minute entry of the order that it was made on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. This being the condition of the record, we must presume that the trial judge did direct the clerk to specify in the original minute order that the new trial was granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, or that he in some way communicated to the clerk the fact that insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict was the ground upon which the order was made. We must presume that, through clerical misprision, the clerk failed to make the entry as directed, or to make it in conformity with the judge's announcement, and that it was for that reason that the court, in the exercise of its inherent power to cause its acts to be correctly recorded, directed the entry of the second order. An appellate court never indulges in presumption to defeat an order or a judgment. On the contrary, every intendment is in favor of the validity and regularity of the order or judgment appealed from. The burden of overcoming this presumption is upon the appellant, and where the record is silent it will be presumed that what ought to have been done was not only done, but rightly done."

The court then concludes that the second minute entry must be treated as a correct record of the order as announced by the trial judge.

We think that the reasoning in the case just referred to is controlling under the circumstances here shown, and that the order of May 1, 1930, must be taken as intended to correct an inadvertence of the clerk in entering the order of April 29, in order to make the record set forth the true situation, and that the minute order of May 1 must be taken as the correct order as originally made by the court.

[4] Appellant argues that, since the transcript in this case was certified as correct, it must be taken to be so, and that no presumptions may then be indulged. He cites Hahn v. Kelley, 34 Cal. 391, 94 Am. Dec. 742, to the effect that, where a record is silent as to what was done, it will be presumed that what ought to have been done was correctly done, but, where a record shows what actually was done, it will not be presumed that something different was done. Assuming the correctness of this rule, the fact remains that, from the transcript before us, nothing appears in this connection except the two minute orders, and, while the record shows that what was done by inadvertence was corrected, it does not show whose was the inadvertence or omission. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, it must be presumed that the action of the court in correcting the minutes was a proper one.

[5, 6] It follows that the order appealed from must be affirmed, unless, in view of the evidence shown by the record, we are of the opinion that the court abused its discretion. A broad discretion is vested in a trial court in passing upon a motion for a new trial. In Brush v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., supra, the rule is thus stated:

"But, while an appellate court will not review a verdict where the evidence shows a substantial conflict, the trial court is guided by very different considerations. If the trial judge, notwithstanding a conflict in the testimony, is satisfied that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, he may, indeed he should, grant a new trial, although upon the same conflict an appellate court would be bound by the verdict. And even though there be no conflict in the testimony, the probative force and effect of the evidence is ultimately for the determination of the trial judge upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial. Meinberg v. Jordan, 29 Cal. App. 762, 157 P. 1005, 1007. The judgment of the trial judge is not based upon the cold record which comes to an appellate court. He hears the evidence, and has ample opportunity to observe the demeanor and manner of the witnesses, and to judge their credibility. If, therefore he is dissatisfied with the verdict, and is of the opinion that it clearly is against the weight of the evidence, he may set it aside and grant a new trial, even though there be substantial evidence to support the verdict. He—'is in a position to determine between the apparent and the real, to detect the fallacy of specious testimony which may have misled the jury, but which his wider experience enables him to readily comprehend. * * * It is for these and other reasons which might be mentioned that a wide discretion is accorded to trial courts in the disposition of motions for new trials.'"

[7, 8] In view of these rules, we are unable to hold that the trial court abused its discretion in the instant case. It is not necessary to review all of the evidence in detail. It does appear that the respondent was crossing a street in the business section of Fresno in the daytime. He was obliged to stop in the street while a truck with high sides passed directly in front of him. The appellant, driving an automobile, was following closely behind this truck. The respondent testified that he stood still and did not move, but that, immediately after the truck passed, the appellant turned the front of his machine sufficiently to his right so that the fender hit respondent's knee and the front wheel passed over his foot, causing the injuries complained of. On the other hand, the appellant testified that he proceeded straight ahead following the truck. While the question of negligence on the part of the appellant and of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff were questions primarily for the jury, they were equally questions calling for the consideration of the trial judge, in considering the motion for new trial, under the familiar rules. Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 78 P. 337.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Rowen, Irwin and W. C. Dorris, all of Bakersfield, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LAMBERSON, Justice pro tem.

Each of the defendants was convicted of the crime of burglary in the first degree and sentenced to a term of imprisonment in the state prison. Judgment was pronounced on July 15, 1930, and oral notice of appeal was given the same day. No written notice of appeal was filed. On Monday, July 21, 1930, six days after pronouncement of judgment, the notice required by section 7 of rule II of the Judicial Council, promulgated for the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, was filed. Said rule provides in part as follows: "Upon an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction or from an order denying his motion for a new trial, or from an order made after judgment, or upon an appeal by the People from an order granting a new trial, or upon an order setting aside an indictment, information or accusation, or from an order made after judgment, the appellant must, within five days after giving notice of the appeal, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal shall be dismissed; provided, that the appeal shall not be dismissed for any defect in the statement of such grounds or points which does not affect the substantial rights of the respondent."

[1] This court will take judicial notice of the fact that July 20, 1930, the fifth day after the giving of notice of appeal, fell on Sunday.

[2] The provisions of the rule of the Judicial Council above cited follow substantially the language theretofore used in section 1247 of the Penal Code prior to its repeal in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1048), and are to be interpreted in the same manner. The provisions of that section and of the rule of the Judicial Council have been held to be mandatory in effect. People v. Riga, 104 Cal. App. 477, 285 P. 1069; People v. Shaw, 81 Cal. App. 312, 253 P. 747. In the latter case it was held that even though the objection is not raised by the respondent, the court would have no jurisdiction to proceed if it should appear to the court that the appellant has failed to comply with the provisions of section 1247 of the Penal Code.

In none of the cases, however, do we find that the question which has arisen here was before the court.

Section 12 of the Political Code provides as follows: "The time in which any act provided by law is to be done is computed by excluding the first day, and including the last, unless the last day is a holiday, and then it is also excluded."

Section 13 of the Political Code provides: "Whenever any act of a secular nature, other than a work of necessity or mercy, is appointed by law, or contract to be performed upon a particular day, which day falls upon a holiday, such act may be performed upon the next business day with the same effect as if it had been performed upon the day appointed."

Like provisions are also contained in the Civil Code and Code of Civil Procedure, and section 4480 of the Political Code says that "with relation to each other, the provisions of the four codes must be construed * * * as though all such codes had been passed at the same moment of time, and were parts of the same statute."

[3] An examination of the California cases discloses that generally speaking when the last day of performance of an act provided by law falls on a Sunday or a holiday, that day is excluded in the computation of time and the act may be performed on the next succeeding day. It has been so applied in the case of service of notice of appeal (Estate of Rose, 63 Cal. 346), in the case of filing an undertaking on appeal (Robinson v. Templar Lodge, etc., 114 Cal. 41, 45 P. 998; Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Standley, 3 Cal. App. 44, 84 P. 214), to the service or presentation of a bill of exceptions (Derr v. Busick, 63 Cal. App. 134, 218 P. 280), to the filing of points and authorities upon appeal (Troy, etc., Co., Ltd., v. Drivers' etc., Co., 13 Cal. App. 115, 109 P. 36), to an application for relief from a judgment made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Bell v. Krauss, 169 Cal. 387, 146 P. 874), and to the time for commencing an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien (Mox v. Leventhal, 89 Cal. App. 253, 264 P. 562).

Those of the above cases which relate to the perfecting of appeals are peculiarly applicable to the condition under consideration, because they cover similar situations, although they are civil and not criminal cases.

In the case of People v. Preciado, 31 Cal. App. 519, 160 P. 1090, it was said, quoting from Estate of Nelson, 128 Cal. 242, 60 P. 772: " 'The right of appeal is conferred by the Constitution, and statutes and rules of procedure for its exercise are to be liberally construed. We are not disposed to dismiss an appeal upon grounds that are purely technical, where there has been no violation or disregard of any express rule of procedure.' "

In the case of People v. Bryant, 207 Cal. 450, 278 P. 1025, involving a motion for dismissal of a criminal appeal under section 1247 of the Penal Code, the court said: "It is the policy of this court, of course, to hear appeals upon the merits and to avoid, if possible, all forfeiture of substantial rights upon technicalities."

The outstanding exception to the general rule hereinbefore stated is found in the interpretation by the courts of that part of section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides in substance that the power of the court to pass upon a motion for a new trial shall expire within two months after the verdict of the jury or service on the moving party of notice of the entry of the judgment, and that if such motion is not determined within said two months the effect shall be a denial of the motion, without further order of the court. This provision constitutes a limitation upon the power of the court and is to be distinguished from the rules governing the procedure to be followed by the parties to the action. No particular stress is to be laid upon the use of the word "within," because an examination of the cases hereinbefore cited, particularly those relating to the service of notice of appeal and the filing of an undertaking on appeal, discloses that the word "within" was used in the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure under consideration. Section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "an appeal may be taken from any judgment or order of a superior court * * * within sixty days from the entry of said judgment or order." Section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure formerly provided in part as follows: "The order of service is immaterial, but the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose unless within five days after service of the notice of appeal, an undertaking be filed. * * *"

[4] We are of the opinion that the provisions of the Political Code hereinbefore cited are applicable to the filing of the notice and application prescribed by section 7 of rule II of the rules of the Judicial Council, that each of the appellants acted in substantial compliance with said rule, and that the motion to dismiss the appeal should be denied. It is so ordered.

county and judgment was pronounced on January 2, 1931. No oral notice of appeal was given by the defendant at that time, but written notice of appeal was served and filed on January 5, 1931, under the provisions of section 1239 of the Penal Code, which provides as follows:

> "An appeal from a judgment may be taken by the defendant by announcing personally or through his attorney in open court at the time the judgment is rendered that he appeals from same or by filing a written notice of appeal within two days after the rendition of judgment with the clerk of the court wherein judgment was rendered; and from any order made after judgment, by announcing in open court at the time the same is made that he appeals from the same."

A motion to dismiss the appeal has been made by respondent upon the ground that the defendant did not file with the clerk of the court, within two days after rendition of judgment, his written notice of appeal. It appears that January 4, 1931, the second day after judgment was pronounced, fell on Sunday, and it is contended by the appellant that he had until January 5, 1931, within which to serve and file his written notice of appeal. It has been aptly pointed out by appellant that a situation might arise where the entire period of two days for the giving of notice under section 1239 of the Penal Code would be covered by holidays, in which event there would be no judicial day upon which the appellant could file his written notice of appeal.

Respondent lays stress upon the use of the word "within" in section 1239 and cites the language of the court in the case of People v. Riga, 104 Cal. App. 477, 285 P. 1069, in which there was some discussion of the interpretation of section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the time within which the trial court must pass upon a motion for a new trial in a civil case. The question now before this court upon this motion was not involved in the decision of that case. We have heretofore had occasion to consider, in the case of People v. Malone & Brown (Cal. App.) 297 P. 964, in which an opinion has been filed on this date, a similar question arising from the application of section 7 of rule II of the rules of the Judicial Council to a case where the last day of the five-day period provided by said rule for the presentation of an application by the appellant to the trial court stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal, and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designating what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed, fell on a Sunday. We are of the opinion that the reasoning of the last-cited case applies to the interpretation of section 1239 of the Penal Code, and upon the authority of that case it is our conclusion that the appellant in the case before the court had all of the day succeeding January 4, 1931, within which to file his written notice of appeal.

It is ordered that the motion for dismissal of the appeal be denied.

Defendant was charged in an information filed by the district attorney with the commission of a felony, to wit, violation of section 288 of the Penal Code. He was tried and convicted. Motion for a new trial was made and denied. This is an appeal from the judgment and order.

Insufficiency of the evidence and misconduct on the part of the jury during the course of the trial are relied on for a reversal. The evidence is of such a revolting character that a recital thereof will not be made in this opinion. The prosecuting witness testified in detail to the acts committed, and her testimony was supported by an eyewitness of the affair. Nor is there any merit in the claim that it was inherently improbable that defendant committed the offense charged. Such cases do occur and their facts are therefore not inherently improbable. People v. Troutman, 187 Cal. 313, 201 P. 928. The further claim that there were irregularities on the part of the jury during the deliberation of the case is also without merit. The affidavit, to the effect that the jury was influenced by one of its members who it is claimed visited the scene of the crime, was denied by counter affidavits. There is no merit in the appeal.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Judgment ⚷414.

Mortgagors held not entitled to aid of equity to vacate decree foreclosing mortgage on ground mortgage was given as temporary subterfuge to shield mortgagors from creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fletcher Bowron, Judge.

Action by Michele Bruno and others against Giovanni Guglielmo and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Frank M. Benedict and George W. Rochester, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ernest M. Torchia, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J.

The plaintiffs below appealed from a judgment of nonsuit rendered on motion of the defendants in a suit praying the vacation of a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage upon real property.

Suit was commenced by the mortgagees against appellants for the foreclosure of a mortgage given by the latter as security for a promissory note. Thereafter a supplemental complaint and alias summons were served in said suit on behalf of respondent as substituted plaintiff who had succeeded to the rights of the plaintiffs by assignment. None of the defendants having appeared, default judgment, decree of foreclosure, order of sale, and a writ of assistance followed simultaneously. There was no attempt made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure by the mortgagors, praying that the judgment be vacated and that they be permitted to answer the supplemental complaint. The grounds of this action sound in fraud and deceit, as stated in appellants' brief, "in falsely representing to plaintiffs and their attorney that they should make no appearance, * * * and that no judgment would be taken against them, and if such judgment was taken, it would be for the plaintiffs' benefit and to preserve their property and that said property would be reconveyed to plaintiffs," at the termination of other litigation against them by creditors.

Appellants' counsel in the original suit testified that it was generally understood, and that he explained to them that that litigation was for the purposes of protecting them against possible demands of creditors in Alameda county. In fact, their contention in the instant case was, and here is, that there was no consideration for the promissory note and mortgage. All of their counsel's negotiations were had through the mortgagee, who employed him for the defendants in that case, and paid him a fee in their behalf. He advised the mortgagors, upon the basis of an understanding with the mortgagee, that "nothing would be done in the action any more than a formal entry of judgment, and that no dispossession would be taken," and that he made no appearance for the reasons so stated. It was also agreed that if the mortgagee was by the general scheme forced to foreclose, the property should be reconveyed to the mortgagors upon a favorable determination of the suits pending in the north. There is nothing tending to indicate that the judgment was entered contrary to such understanding of the parties, that the mortgagee would decline, or had been requested, to reconvey at the time agreed upon, nor that the mortgagors would be precluded from demanding a reconveyance in appropriate proceedings.

The sole ground asserted for equitable relief is that the original suit was commenced to foreclose a mortgage given as a subterfuge to shield the defendants therein from creditors, with the understanding that when the storm should subside the judgment if taken should be vacated. In fear of a threatened breach of this clandestine agreement of the parties, the mortgagors attempt to invoke the aid of equity for its enforcement, and it is strenuously insisted that they have a substantial defense to the respondents' alleged cause of action. It is settled law that courts of equity will not interfere to relieve a party from a judgment in such cases. Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 359, 173 P. 579, L. R. A. 1918F, 1029.

The judgment is affirmed.

COHEN v. BERMAN et al.

Civ. 6448.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

March 31, 1931.

Attorney and client 🔑166(2).

Frauds, statute of 🔑158(4).

Evidence supported findings that defendant employed attorney, and that codefendant's promise to pay fees was original promise, justifying attorney's recovery against both.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

Action by Philip Cohen against Jacob Berman, also known as Jack Bennett, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Dudley Robinson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ben C. Cohen, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, an attorney at law, sued defendants for the reasonable value of legal services alleged to have been rendered them. The defendants answered, denying that they were indebted to plaintiff in the amount claimed or in any other sum, and defendant Jacob Berman, also known as Jack Bennett, filed an amended answer which, in addition to said denial, set up the further defense of the statute of frauds. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendants appeal.

On the part of appellant Louis Berman, it is contended that the contract for respondent's employment was made with a firm of attorneys in New York, and that it covered the entire service rendered by respondent, that such contract was never terminated, and that respondent had no right to charge Louis Berman as the party primarily liable thereon, and that the latter's assent to the continued employment of respondent did not constitute a novation. Appellant Jacob Berman contends that he did not make or join in the original contract of employing respondent, and that any subsequent promise made by him is within the statute of frauds and void. The court found that respondent was employed by Louis Berman, and that the promise of Jacob Berman "was an original promise and constituted a direct obligation and promise of the said defendant to the plaintiff in conjunction with the promise of defendant Louis Berman to pay for the services rendered and to be rendered for the defendant Louis Berman by said plaintiff."

The first intimation which plaintiff received of possible employment was a wire dated May 17, 1927, signed by Mark Eisner of the New York law firm of Olvany, Eisner & Donnelly, which advised plaintiff that he would "be visited by Louis Berman brother of Jack Bennett," and contained the following instructions: "Take care of him I represent Jack Bennett Please advise regarding developments." Shortly thereafter Louis Berman called on plaintiff, but before that plaintiff had not met either defendant.

In a conversation with Mr. Donnelly of the New York firm, according to plaintiff's testimony, the latter said to Donnelly, in regard to fees, that $10,000 should be paid as a retaining fee for all services up to the time of trial; that the $10,000 should be divided up in this way: That $5,000 should be fixed immediately as a retaining fee and $5,000 held for expenses as they were incurred, the balance, if any, to be applied on general fees; "and that if the case goes to trial, that an arrangement should be made for further compensation. He said he felt that was reasonable." Thereafter plaintiff received a letter from the New York firm, written by Donnelly, in which he states: "Today, when I conferred with Mrs. Berman, she delivered to me a check to your order for $10,000, of which you are to take $5,000 as fees, and $5,000 to apply as disbursements in the matter concerning which you and I spoke while we were there. So much as is not used by you for disbursements may be applied toward your general fees." At that time Louis Berman was evidently in Los Angeles and Jacob Berman in New York; and it is apparent from the letter that the first employment included, not only the representation of Louis Berman, but services to be performed for Jacob Berman as well. It also appears from the evidence that the check for $10,000 received by plaintiff was the "check of Mildred Berman, Mr. Jacob Berman's wife."

The plaintiff also testified that about January 3d or 4th "Mr. Louis Berman called me up on the phone and stated to me as follows: 'You know our case comes up for trial,' I believe he said, 'tomorrow.' I said, 'Yes, I know all about it.' He said, 'You are going to be there to represent me.' I said, 'If you desire to have me represent you I will certainly be there, but some arrangement must be made for my compensation per day during the trial.' He said, 'I know that, and you will be paid for your services.'" The question of fees for the trial was again brought up by plaintiff at a luncheon arranged for that purpose and attended by both defendants. Concerning that, the plaintiff testified: "While we were lunching there I said to both of these defendants—they were both sitting opposite me: 'Now you know, Louis, I have been paid a certain amount of money, which went as general fees under a retainer;' that that had reference to my services in this matter which had taken place from March 20th until the time of the trial; 'here with you in my office pretty near every day from March until September, seeking confidential advice, getting advice, and almost turning my office over to you and your brother in this particular case; going down to New York and communicated certain arrangements that were made in the case for your brother; * * * that that ten thousand dollars has long since been used up. * * * We have met here today, and I want to have some definite understanding as to my fees.' He said, 'Well, what are they?' Jack Bennett said, 'What are they?' Mr. Louis Berman did very little talking. In fact, I don't think he did any. I said, 'I will tell you, Jack, in this case here it is a case of quite some importance. I had assurance from the district attorney that the indictment against Louis here will be dismissed as soon as the jury is polled. * * * I can't consider that as a certainty. * * * I must be in court from ten o'clock in the morning until court adjourns in the evening. I will have very little time for work in my office. * * * And I think under the circumstances $200 is a very reasonable charge per day for my services.' * * * Jacob Berman turned around and said to me, 'If you say that $200 is a reasonable fee it will be so paid.' So I said, 'All I want is what is reasonable.' * * * I then turned around, and he said, 'All right * * * you will be paid a reasonable fee. Let the matter stand a few days.' I said, 'that is all right with me.' He said, 'All right; whatever is reasonable you will be paid.' I said, 'Then you want me to wait until that motion [the motion to dismiss]?' He said, 'Yes.' I said, 'Is that all right with you, Louis?' He said, 'Yes.' I said, 'Then it is all right with me.' So I proceeded and continued to proceed in that trial." After that an arrangement was made, according to the testimony of plaintiff, that Jacob Berman's attorney would represent his brother Louis, and in the consent to plaintiff's withdrawal from the case, which was dated February 6, 1928, and signed by both defendants, appears the following: "In addition to the sum of money heretofore paid you as retaining fee, we agree that between now and March 1, 1928, to pay you such reasonable sum as both yourself and we may agree upon for all of your services to this date."

We have quoted quite at length from the testimony to show that there is evidence to support the findings of the trial court. The money paid respondent for his time and expenses up to the trial came from Jacob Berman's wife. Respondent commenced the trial, not only by reason of the original agreement, but also because of the express request of the defendant Louis Berman, and both defendants repeatedly promised to pay a reasonable fee per day for the time he was engaged therein. No question is raised as to the reasonableness of the fee allowed by the court. We find no error in the judgment rendered.

Judgment affirmed.

WARNER et al. v. TAFT LAND & DEVELOPMENT CO. et al.

Civ. 7731.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.
March 30, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 29, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 28, 1931.

1. Trial 388(1).

Main purpose of findings is to indicate decision of court on material issues sufficient to support judgment.

2. Trial 🔑404(1).

Findings are to be liberally construed as whole, and apparent conflicts are to be reconciled, if possible, with other findings to support judgment.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑123.

Findings held sufficient to support judgment refusing to rescind executory contract to purchase realty on ground of fraudulent representations.

Court found that salesman made no false or fraudulent misrepresentations of existing facts to induce plaintiffs to purchase property nor for purpose of entering into contract with intention of deceiving plaintiffs. Findings set forth representations alleged to have been made, and recited that it was not proved that representations made by sales agent were false or known by agent at time to have been false, nor that agent made statements as false or fraudulent misrepresentations, and that no false or fraudulent representations were made by defendants to defraud plaintiffs or induce them to enter into contract, but that plaintiffs executed contract of own free will without any inducement through fraud.

4. Trial 🔑395(1).

Finding that specific representations were not made as alleged and that no misrepresentations were made was sufficient finding on issues alleged in complaint to rescind contract for fraud.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑123.

In action to rescind contract for fraud, lack of finding on promptness of rescission or salesman's agential capacity was immaterial after finding that facts were insufficient for rescission and that agent never made representations.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1071(3).

If findings sustained by evidence support judgment, it is immaterial that other findings lack evidentiary support.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1).

In determining sufficiency of evidence to support findings, trial court's conclusion will be accepted on appeal if supported by evidence, though contradicted.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1).

Trial court's finding is conclusive on appeal on discovery of slightest real conflict in evidence, though contrary conclusion would appear to have more support.

9. Vendor and purchaser 🔑44.

Evidence held to support finding that plaintiffs were not induced to enter into executory contract to purchase realty by fraudulent misrepresentations.

> Evidence showed that purchaser on own initiative sought to purchase land as investment, but became doubtful thereof after executing contract and before payment because return might be too slow for his age. Purchaser wrote letter to vendors expressing no dissatisfaction and questioning only one representation, and almost year before rescission consulted attorney and was informed that only way out was to prove misrepresentations.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1032(1).

Error constituting ground for reversal must be shown prejudicial to extent resulting in miscarriage of justice.

11. Evidence 🔑400(2).

Where parties dealt at arm's length and purchaser acquiesced in contract disclaiming responsibility for anything beyond writing, contract was measure of liability (Civ. Code, § 1625).

> Purchaser sued to rescind executory contract for sale of land because of alleged fraudulent representations. Contract provided that it was agreed that purchaser inspected property and had contracted to purchase by reason of own knowledge and not by reason of representations of vendor and that purchaser waived all claims for damages because of representations by agent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Action by Willard C. Warner and another against the Taft Land & Development Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Clock, McWhinney & Clock, of Long Beach, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for the rescission of an executory contract to purchase certain real estate in the county of Los Angeles upon the ground of fraudulent representations. The main grounds urged for a reversal of the judgment, which was in favor of the defendants, involve the sufficiency of the findings of the trial court. It is urged by appellant that the so-called findings do not disclose what facts were found, if any, and that the said findings are hopelessly in conflict with each other and also that material issues are left entirely without finding of any sort. These contentions, if correct, would go far towards compelling a reversal of the judgment; indeed, little further inquiry would be necessary.

It was alleged in the complaint that C. A. Campbell solicited plaintiffs to purchase the lot in question and to enter into a contract for the purchase of the same and that he represented and stated as a fact to said plaintiffs certain things, enumerating them in detail. For the purpose of this discussion it might be admitted that the facts thus alleged to have been stated were material and if untrue would, with other elements present, suffice to sustain plaintiffs' cause of action. It was then alleged that each and every of said representations and statements were untrue and known by said Campbell to be untrue when he made the same and that said Campbell made said false statements and misrepresentations in order to cheat and wrong the plaintiffs and to induce them to enter into the contract. These allegations were denied and thus issue was joined thereon. It may be noted, at this stage, that a firm known as Deeble & Myers were the selling agents of defendant Taft Land & Development Company, and that said firm had authorized one I. H. Lunt to find purchasers for said property, and that C. A.

Campbell was a salesman employed by Lunt. The findings of the trial court are as follows: That it is not true that on or about the 30th day of July 1926, Deeble & Myers or C. A. Campbell made any false or fraudulent misrepresentations of existing facts in order to induce plaintiffs to purchase the property (describing the same); nor, for the purpose of inducing them to enter into a written contract for the purchase thereof, falsely stated or misrepresented as existing facts (with any intention of deceiving said plaintiffs) the facts alleged in the complaint. Here the finding sets forth categorically the representations alleged to have been made. That it is not true that each and every, or any, of the statements and representations made by the said C. A. Campbell were false, nor that they were known by said C. A. Campbell at the time to have been false, nor that the said C. A. Campbell made statements as false or fraudulent statements or misrepresentations in order to cheat or wrong the plaintiffs, or to induce them to enter into said contract, or otherwise. The court further finds that no false or fraudulent representations were made by the defendants, or either of them, or Deeble & Myers or by C. A. Campbell, either as alleged in plaintiffs' complaint, or at all, and further that no false or fraudulent representations were made by the defendants or by Deeble & Myers or by C. A. Campbell either for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiffs or of inducing them to purchase the property involved (describing the same) or inducing them to enter into said written contract for the purchase thereof; and that plaintiffs purchased said property and executed the said contract of their own free will and accord and without any inducement through any fraud, either as alleged in plaintiffs' complaint or otherwise or at all. That it is not true that the plaintiffs in or about June, 1927, or at any other time, discovered any facts which entitled them to rescind said contract, nor that plaintiffs, upon discovery of any facts which they believed or were informed entitled them to rescind said contract, promptly made any rescission of said contract or upon being advised by an attorney as to the necessary basis for a rescission either promptly or at all caused to be delivered to defendants any sufficient notice of rescission and/or offered to restore to defendants everything of value received by plaintiffs. That it is not true that the plaintiffs were without knowledge of the things stated in the complaint; nor that plaintiffs believed said statements and/or representations or relied thereon; that it is not true that plaintiffs, believing and/or relying on said alleged statements or representations, entered into a contract for the purchase of the property described. That it is not true that at all times mentioned in plaintiffs' complaint the market value of the property was much less than $4,400, or that plaintiffs were damaged by reason of any statements or representations, false or otherwise. As hereinbefore stated, the attack of plaintiffs on these findings is both specific and general. Every phrase of the findings is taken up separately and analyzed and conclusion being reached agreeable to plaintiffs' contention, with respect to one detached phrase this forms the groundwork for attack upon another part of the findings. And so on throughout the entire list. For instance, it is first urged that the finding that no false or fraudulent representations were made to induce plaintiffs to enter into the contract is pregnant with the finding that such representations were made for some other purpose. That therefore the subsequent finding that no false or fraudulent representations were made is in conflict. And finally it is contended that when the court finds that no false representations were ever made it does not find whether or not untrue representations were made; the basis of this argument being that in as far as falsity of a statement implies a willful intent to deceive, a representation may be untrue and yet not be false. To follow through the contentions of appellant would require almost a treatise on philosophy, logic, grammar, and punctuation. From the older decisions abundant and respectable authority is cited which in a measure supports the appellants' claims.

[1-3] It must be conceded, however, that we have passed through the period of these decisions and have emerged into the more open field where the main purpose of findings (and a large portion of the bench and bar but grudgingly admit that findings serve any purpose) is to indicate the decision of the court upon the material issues sufficient to support the judgment. The findings are to be liberally construed and are to be construed as a whole and where conflicts seem to be present these are to be reconciled if possible with other findings to the end that the judgment may be supported, if reasonably possible so to do. In the case of Berry v. Crowell, 55 Cal. App. 534, 537, 203 P. 835, 836, it is said: "If sufficient can be gathered from the whole of the findings of the court that material issues are fairly determined, the finding will support the judgment. 'It was not necessary that the facts as found should be in any particular form or follow the pleadings. If the truth or falsity of each material allegation in issue can be demonstrated from the findings, the law is complied with.'" And in American National Bank v. Donnellan, 170 Cal. 9, 15, 148 P. 188, 190, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 744, we find the following: "* * * however unsupported, however lame, however inconclusive, any number of the findings may be, if in any case there be one clear, sustained, and sufficient finding upon which the judgment may rest, every presumption being in favor of the judgment, it will be here concluded that the court did rest its judgment upon that finding.

or those findings, and the others may and will be disregarded." See also cases referred to in the opinion as cited and also the cases of Klegman v. Moyer, 91 Cal. App. 333, 346, 266 P. 1009, and Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 571, 217 P. 750. Without further analysis of each finding or discussion of the objections raised thereto, we conclude, under the principles laid down in the cited cases, that the findings are sufficient to support the judgment.

[4, 5] Appellants next contend that the court failed to find on certain material issues. Appellants again review the findings and call specific attention to the detailed representations alleged to have been made and complain of the lack of a finding as to each. The court did find, as hereinbefore shown, that the specific representations were not made as alleged in the complaint and that no misrepresentations or false representations of any kind were made as stated or otherwise. Without repeating, we deem the findings covered the requirements. Next are a series of allegations and denials upon which finding is alleged to be lacking. While these specifications of omission are not wholly in accord with the record the fact remains that even if appellants are correct in their contention that certain other material issues are without finding we hold, under the authorities hereinbefore cited, that sufficient was found to sustain the judgment. And illustrating, the lack of a finding on the issue of the sufficiency or promptness of the alleged rescission or the lack of a finding on the agential capacity of the salesman became of no moment after it is found that there were insufficient facts upon which to base a rescission and that the alleged agent never made any untrue or false representations. Sharp v. Pitman, 166 Cal. 501, 137 P. 234.

[6-9] The next argument advanced by appellants is that the findings are not supported by the evidence. This opens up a wide field of inquiry. At the outset it may be well, perhaps at the expense of repetition, to note that the pleadings present many issues and that if it should happen that findings on some issues lack evidentiary support, nevertheless if the remaining findings, amply supported, support the judgment, then under the case of Sharp v. Pitman, supra, and the general rule in accord therewith, it becomes immaterial whether or not the other findings are discarded or accepted. And again, in approaching the inquiry as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support any finding, it is a fundamental rule of appellate practice that we will not attempt to solve again any conflicts in the testimony, but will accept as final the conclusion of the trial court where we find evidence supporting the same, regardless of the fact that much evidence might be opposed thereto. Repeating, there were many issues and many phases of the case. There was the issue of fraud as involved in the alleged representations inducing the contract; there was the question of knowledge on the part of plaintiffs respecting the facts represented and the opportunities of investigation. Likewise the matter of investigation, independent of the representations. And, aside from these considerations, there was the issue of promptness of rescission after knowledge of facts and the manner of rescission. It might well be that the trial court's finding on fraud was correct and its finding on reliance thereon incorrect without affecting the judgment, and this same situation might exist with reference to any of the findings. Yet, if the finding that there was no fraud or misrepresentation and that the contract was freely entered into were the correct finding or at least a finding supported by the evidence, then it would be manifest that there was, in the present case, no grounds for rescission and the mode of attempted rescission or its sufficiency would be wholly immaterial. We are not inclined to discuss minutely each finding and the details supporting the same. We have carefully read the record presented and we conclude that the findings have ample support. As a background of the entire case its general outline may be sketched. While the executed contract is in the name of both of the plaintiffs the actual negotiations were by the plaintiff Willard C. Warner. He was a man of wide business experience and acquainted with real estate in Southern California and in the vicinity wherein the land in question is located. He, on his own initiative, sought out the tract and began without solicitation his inquiry as to the merits of the investment. After executing the contract and before any payments thereunder he had become doubtful as to whether he should proceed further, expressing the thought, not that he had been defrauded, but that at his age the returns might be slow in materializing. In his attempt at withdrawal or expression of desire to that end, and after all of the alleged representations had been made he wrote a letter to defendants expressing no dissatisfaction and questioning but one representation, namely, as to the construction of a street or boulevard. Plaintiffs then, almost a year before the rescission, consulted an attorney, denying this until confronted with written proof. Notwithstanding this examination and their claimed suspicions no action was taken until almost a year thereafter. Incidentally, it appeared that at the time of consulting the attorney they were advised that their only way out was to prove misrepresentations. With this background and the veracity of plaintiffs impeached, it is not difficult to infer that the trial court looked with some distrust upon the entire testimony of plaintiffs, and from this viewpoint it took perhaps less evidence on the part of the defendants. The court below had the witnesses before it and there was available to that court an opportunity to find the truth that is not nor cannot be presented to us. So, therefore, while there may be a finding where from the mere record a contrary conclusion would appear to have more support, we deem the inquiry closed upon discovery of the slightest real conflict in the evidence. Without further discussion we hold that sufficient evidence supports findings ample to sustain the judgment.

[10] Finally appellants urge errors committed by the trial court in its rulings upon the admission or rejection of evidence as grounds for reversal. There are some seventy-two specifications of error set forth. We have gone over these one by one and find no sufficient reason for disturbing the judgment. It must always be remembered that error constituting ground for reversal must be shown to be prejudicial to an extent resulting in a miscarriage of justice. Errors such as alleged here could have no such effect if every specification were well founded. A detailed discussion of each specification of error would almost necessarily demand a detailed analysis of all of the testimony from each point of attack. For instance, it might well be that evidence rejected was admissible and yet the record discloses that the same evidence was received at some other stage of the proceeding and from the same witness. And likewise where error is alleged, as here, in the rejection of testimony sought to be adduced on the ground that the questions eliciting such testimony were leading, it would seem almost obvious that after an objection is sustained to a question as being leading the purpose of suggestion has been accomplished and it is rarely that the complaining party is unable to elicit the same testimony by proper question. We have, as indicated, noted carefully the errors complained of and repeat that none of them nor all of them would constitute a compelling basis for a reversal. We find, however, that there is some merit in but a few of these specifications. On the whole the rulings of the trial court were correct. The few errors, which might be conceded, were not prejudicial to an extent warranting our interference with the judgment.

[11] Lest this be deemed a too summary mode of disposing of the claims of the appellants, we will, in conclusion, note another feature of the case which might indicate that the case and the appeal has received more consideration than it warranted. The contract contains a clause reading as follows: "It is understood and agreed that the property above described has been inspected by the buyer or the buyer's duly authorized agent and that the buyer has contracted to purchase the property covered by this contract by reason of the buyer's own knowledge thereof and not upon, or by reason of, any representations made by said seller or any selling agent, and said buyer hereby waives any and all claim for damages because of any representation made by any selling agent or person whatsoever other than what is contained in this contract and the said seller shall not in any way be responsible or liable for any inducement, promise, representation, agreement, condition or stipulation not set forth therein." It seems that this provision is not lacking in clarity. There is nothing before us to indicate that the buyer, plaintiffs, did not or should not have read the contract before signing; nor is there evidence that the physical execution was procured or induced by fraud or design. All that the record can disclose is that the execution of the contract, as far as physical execution goes, was admittedly the free and presumed intelligent act of the buyers. In Gridley v. Tilson, 202 Cal. 748, 751, 262 P. 322, 323, it is said: "While the Civil Code, § 1625, provides that a written contract supersedes all negotiations and stipulations concerning the matter between the parties, it has always been the law that fraud in the inducement of a contract may be shown. A well-settled exception, however, is the case where the party seeking to rely on fraudulent representations of an agent had notice of the limitation on the agent's authority to make representations. Therefore a principal is bound only by the representations embodied in the written contract, where a provision in the contract notified the prospective purchaser that the agent's authority went no further." And the court goes further in commenting upon the proffered excuse as to why the contract, in the cited case, was not read. In this connection it says: "But this cannot afford him an excuse, in the absence of a showing that he was prevented by the agent from reading the limiting clause, or was otherwise tricked into signing the document without reading it." Many authorities are cited in support of the rule thus declared. In the instant case the fraudulent representations are charged to the selling agent and there is nothing to take the case out of the rule. The language employed might not, in every conceivable case, protect the seller. This we do not decide. Fraud manifests itself in various and varied forms, and it might be that a case could be made wherein a sufficient showing of hardship and oppression might be made to limit this rule within confines compatible with the ever-existing purpose of the law, namely, the preservation of justice. Yet, in the absence of any peculiar showing, the wording of the contract cannot be ignored entirely. Much of modern business is done through some form of agency and if there were no way in which a principal, himself without fault, could be apprised of the integrity and finality of his contract we fear that an unhappy condition of insecurity would result. The buyer and the seller here were dealing at arms length and when the latter so plainly informed the former that his contract was based only upon the express conditions thereof and disclaimed responsibility for anything beyond the writing and the buyer thereupon acquiesced, it follows that the contract as thus made was the measure of the liability of the parties thereto.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action in conversion against the defendants. Later she amended her complaint. The defendants appeared and answered the complaint as amended, and the trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. At the end of the plaintiff's case the defendants made a motion for a nonsuit. The court made an order granting the motion, and the plaintiff has appealed, bringing up typewritten transcripts. In plaintiff's amended complaint she alleged that the defendants were partners transacting a general stock brokerage business in San Francisco; that on the 21st day of July, 1926, plaintiff was the owner of sixty units of the stock of the National Ice Cream Company; that each unit consisted of one share of preferred stock of the value of $100 per share and one share of common stock of no par value; that said stock was of the value of $6,000; that on July 21, 1926, plaintiff agreed to purchase from defendants forty additional units of the same stock and agreed to pay $4,000 therefor; that thereupon she executed her promissory note payable six months after date for the sum of $4,000, bearing interest at 8 per cent. per annum; that thereafter she delivered to defendants said promissory note; that thereafter on August 4, 1926, defendants converted said hundred units to their own use; and "that plaintiff has made demand upon said defendants for the return of said units of said corporation stock, but to return the same defendants have refused and still refuse to return or deliver to said plaintiff the said one hundred units of said corporation stock." The defendants interposed several denials, but they did not deny the paragraph just quoted. Excepting the allegation of conversion, the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to support each and all of her allegations. In doing so it transpired that, when she executed the promissory note in the sum of $4,000 she brought forward her certificates evidencing the said sixty units, indorsed the certificates in blank, and delivered them to the defendants to hold as security for the payment of the above-mentioned promissory note. After the defendants received the certificates for the said sixty shares, the defendants held, together with said certificates, many other certificates evidencing stock in the same corporation. Of the stock represented by said certificates the defendants owned several hundred shares in their own right. On August 3, 1926, the defendants received an order for one hundred units. That order came from H. D. McCoy. The defendants thereupon sold and delivered to McCoy the certificates for sixty shares so delivered to the defendants by the plaintiff and certain other certificates, making up the total of one hundred units as contained in the order of McCoy. At no time did the plaintiff pay any of the principal or interest represented by the said promissory note. About March 20, 1928, the plaintiff borrowed from the defendants $2,000, and thereupon a new note dated March 20, 1928, for the principal sum of $6,000 bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum was executed by the plaintiff to the defendants. It was agreed that the note last mentioned was to take the place of the $4,000 note and was also to evidence the $2,000 so borrowed from the defendants by the plaintiff. The note in form is a collateral note, and recites that it was secured by one hundred units of the stock of the corporation above mentioned. On May 18, 1928, no part of the principal or interest had been paid on the note last mentioned. On that date the defendants wrote to plaintiff asking her to call and settle the National Ice Cream account. Later that was done. At the time of the settlement the agreed market value of the said units was $65 per share. The stock for which the plaintiff had agreed to pay $4,000 was worth only $2,600—a loss of $1,400. The defendants added to the $1,400, $2,000 for moneys loaned, making a charge of $3,400. Estimated in the same manner the plaintiff's sixty shares were then worth $3,900, deducting from that sum $3,400, the balance owing to the plaintiff was $500, which the defendants paid to the plaintiff. At the same time the defendants loaned her $4,000 on a mortgage on real estate on property down the peninsula, and said loan is now outstanding and unpaid.

The plaintiff calls to our attention that on August 4, 1926, the date when the defendants sold her sixty units, the plaintiff's note was not due, and that she was not in default in either principal or interest, and that the act of making said sale was in and of itself a conversion. The defendants reply that the evidence shows that, at the time the defendants sold the certificates which they had received from the plaintiff, the defendants owned and had on hand a large quantity of the same identical securities and at all times were ready, able, and willing to deliver to the plaintiff the full sum of one hundred units whenever the plaintiff should have completed making her payments, and therefore no conversion took place. They cite Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99, and Bell v. Bank of California, 153 Cal. 234, 94 P. 889, sustaining their contention. The answer is full and complete.

[1, 2] It appears, therefore, that, on the theory of an overt act of conversion, the plaintiff had not made a prima facie case. But she now contends that, because she had alleged that she had made a demand and the demand was refused, there was a constructive conversion. This second theory ignores the facts concerning the plaintiff's continued indebtedness to the defendants. The plaintiff did not allege, and at the trial she did not present any evidence to the effect that, when she made her alleged demand, she tendered, or at any time tendered, to the defendants any part or portion of her indebtedness. Such a demand unaccompanied by a legal tender would not support an action in conversion. 38 Cyc. 2058; Lininger Implement Co. v. Queen City Foundry Co., 73 Colo. 412, 216 P. 527, 530.

It is contended that the motion for a nonsuit was not sufficiently specific to support the order made by the trial court. The motion was made in open court. It was there argued. No contention was made that it was not sufficiently specific. The language of the motion appears in the record. After reading it and after reading the objection which is now made by the plaintiff, we are unable to say the defendants should have made their motion any more specific.

[3] Finally the plaintiff asserts that on a motion for a nonsuit the evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant, and, if the plaintiff has produced proof sufficient to make out a prima facie case under the allegations of his complaint, the motion, if made on the close of his case, should be denied. In re Daly, 15 Cal. App. 331, 114 P. 787. Conceding such to be the rule, the first question is whether the plaintiff had made out a prima facie case. She claims she had on the grounds that she had shown that the defendants' acts were (1) an illegal assumption of ownership, and (2) an illegal use or misuser. Glaze v. McMillion, 7 Port. (Ala.) 279. Applying the first assignment to the sixty units, the evidence was all one way and showed no illegal assumption of ownership. Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99. As to use or misuse, there was no evidence on the subject. As to the forty units, there was no evidence of any conversion under either assignment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George W. McDill, Judge.

Action by Mrs. S. E. Bush against Mary Bastian and Mrs. H. K. Herbert. From an adverse judgment, defendant last named appeals.

Judgment against appellant reversed, with directions.

John M. Martin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Willebrandt & Horowitz, of Los Angeles for respondent.

MARKS, J.

[1] Respondent was the owner of a bungalow court in the city of Los Angeles. On or about September 1, 1923, she entered into a written lease of this property with the defendant Mary Bastian. The term of the lease was for five years at the monthly rental o $315, payable in advance on the first day of each month. On or about November 19, 1923 Mary Bastian assigned the lease to Mrs. H. K Herbert, the appellant. The following allegation appears in the complaint concerning this assignment: "That on or about the 19th da of November, 1923, the said defendant, Mary Bastian, assigned said lease to the defendant Mrs. H. K. Herbert, with the express stipulation that she, the said Mary Bastian, woul continue to be bound by all of the terms of said lease; that pursuant to said assignment the said defendant, Mrs. H. K. Herbert, went into possession and occupation of said premises."

Nowhere in the complaint is it alleged tha the appellant agreed to assume the obligations of the lease or to pay the rent therein reserved. It was merely a naked assignment. It is alleged in the complaint that on or about February 10, 1925, both defendants vacated and abandoned the leased premises. Respondent brought this action to recover the unpaid rent. It is alleged that $185 rental was unpaid for the month of December, 1924, and that all the subsequent rentals were unpaid by the defendants. Respondent, however, succeeded in leasing the premises at a reduced rental which she credited on the amount claimed to be due from the defendants. Mary Bastian filed an answer, but Mrs. H. K. Herbert did not appear, and her default was entered. The case went to trial upon the issues presented by the complaint and the answer of Mary Bastian. Judgment was entered in favor of respondent and against both defendants in the sum of $5,004.77. Mrs. Herbert prosecutes this appeal on the judgment roll alone, and maintains that, as the complaint failed to state a cause of action against her, the judgment cannot be sustained.

It is evident from the complaint that no privity of contract existed between respondent and appellant, their relations being limited to a privity of estate as the appellant did not agree to assume the obligations of the lease or to pay the rent. It is said in 15 Cal. Jur. 753: "Privity of contract between landlord and lessee, however, is not affected by the latter's assignment, but continues until the end of the term notwithstanding he is no longer in possession of the premises. In the absence of fresh contractual stipulation, there is no privity of contract between the assignee and the landlord. But the assignee may, by express stipulation to be bound by the covenants of the lease, create a privity of contract between himself and the landlord, which will also endure till the term expires. By virtue of such an agreement the assignee becomes liable upon and entitled to the benefit of all the covenants of the lease as such. It seems, however, that to establish privity of contract between landlord and assignee, the necessary agreement must be made between them themselves. It is not sufficient that the assignee should have promised his assignor to perform the covenants of the lease. Such a promise is enforceable only by the original lessee."

In the case of Chase v. Oehlke, 43 Cal. App. 435, 185 P. 425, 426, the court said: "Appellants' first contention is that, as assignees of the lease, their liability as tenants of the property was, as to the landlord, limited to their occupancy of the same, and terminated with their abandonment of possession. This is true where the tenant holds under a mere naked assignment of the lease, since the sole basis of his obligation is what is termed the privity of estate (section 822, Civ. Code; Samuels v. Ottinger, 169 Cal. 209, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 830, 146 P. 638; Carter v. Hammett, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 608; Bonetti v. Treat, 91 Cal. 226, 14 L. R. A. 151, 27 P. 612)."

[2] It would appear clear, therefore, that under the allegations of the complaint the liability of appellant to respondent was limited to the rentals accruing prior to her abandonment of the possession of the leased premises.

[3-5] Respondent earnestly maintains that this court cannot reverse the judgment against appellant, even though it be excessive because of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. This section provides that "no judgment shall be set aside * * * for any error as to any matter of pleading * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." It is her contention that, as no evidence has been brought up on this appeal, this court cannot examine it and as a result is powerless to correct the apparently erroneous judgment of the trial court. In support of this contention she cites the cases: Bird v. Murphy, 72 Cal. App. 39, 236 P. 154; Meyer v. Moore, 72 Cal. App. 367, 237 P. 550; Turner v. Stock, 79 Cal. App. 662, 251 P. 814; Platner v. Vincent, 194 Cal. 436, 229 P. 24, and Etienne v. Kendall, 202 Cal. 251, 259 P. 752. In these cases the appeals were taken on the judgment rolls alone after issues joined and trials had upon the merits. It was held that under such circumstances the appellate courts are required to presume, in support of judgments, that the evidence submitted fully sustained the findings and supported the judgments of the trial court; that the pleadings were treated at the trials as sufficient to raise the issues determined by the findings, and that the evidence on such issues went in without such objection. Silvers v. Grossman, 183 Cal. 696, 192 P. 534. Under such circumstances the appellate courts have refused to reverse the judgments on the grounds of deficiencies in the pleadings, section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution furnishing ample authority for such rulings.

The instant case is easily distinguishable from the cases cited by respondent. In the case before us, the default of appellant was entered, and no evidence was introduced against her or on her behalf. Consequently we cannot assume that the case against her was tried upon the theory of the sufficiency of the pleadings, or that the evidence supported the findings and judgment. There is no evidence to bring up to this court and there is no evidence to be reviewed here. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution is remedial in its nature and beneficent in its purpose. It was adopted to prevent the necessity of reversing a judgment for highly technical reasons where the judgment was fair and equitable. It was not intended to permit injustice nor to require an appellate court to uphold a judgment which on the face of the record appears unfair, unjust, and excessive. The words, "including the evidence," must be held to apply only to a case in which evidence was taken in the court below and not to such a case as we have here, where no evidence was introduced by the parties to the appeal for or against each other.

Under ordinary circumstances this court would reduce the amount of the judgment against appellant to the few hundred dollars rent appearing from the pleadings to have been unpaid by her during her occupancy of the premises. Respondent earnestly urges that, at the time of the assignment of the lease to appellant, she agreed in writing to assume its obligations. If this allegation can be supplied to the complaint and evidence produced in its support, it would seem inequitable to preclude respondent from offering the amendments and furnishing the evidence.

The judgment against appellant is reversed, with directions to the trial court to permit respondent to amend her complaint against appellant should she be so advised.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by J. P. Treff against J. Gulko. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Burke, Camarillo & Herron, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Eastham & Smith, of San Pedro, for respondent.

LAMBERSON, Justice pro tem.

On August 25, 1924, respondent, Treff, leased to two persons certain storeroom premises at San Pedro for the term of five years, beginning September 1, 1924, and for a total rental of $9,000, payable in monthly installments graduated from $125 per month for the first year to $175 per month during the fifth year. The lease was assigned to appellant, the lessor consenting thereto, on February 2, 1925, but appellant signed no acceptance or agreement to take over the lease. He occupied and paid rent for the premises from February 2, 1925, up to and including the month of February, 1926. The court found that appellant entered into possession of the premises and paid such rentals. No objection has been made to such finding, and the evidence is sufficient to support it. Appellant paid rent at a reduced amount during a portion of the time the premises were occupied by him, by agreement with respondent. In December, 1925, and January, 1926, the two parties had some conversations about the rent, and the lessor told the appellant that the rent, beginning with January, would be $150, and the appellant said, in effect, that he could not pay that amount because of business conditions, and that he was going to move out. He did quit the premises during the early part of February, 1926, and paid no further rents.

The premises, apparently, remained vacant until January 1, 1927, when respondent leased them for $75 per month for the first eighteen months of a term, and at the rate of $100 per month for the following eighteen months, the total length of such term being in excess of the unexpired portion of the term specified in the original lease.

On March 2, 1926, respondent lessor gave written notice to appellant that he refused to accept appellant's "attempt to surrender the possession of the premises," and demanded payment of the rent up to and including the month of March. Other demands for rent were made at later dates, both in writing and orally. The complaint in this action was filed on March 12, 1928. The court found that plaintiff notified defendant lessee that he would hold defendant liable for the payment of all of the rent reserved in the lease, and that plaintiff would release the premises to the best advantage for the account and benefit of defendant, and that said premises were relet for the benefit and account of defendant and for the best price obtainable therefor. The court gave judgment in favor of the respondent lessor in the sum of $2,625 after deducting the amount received by reason of reletting the premises.

The appellant lessee appeals from the judgment and contends that plaintiff and respondent accepted the surrender of the premises from appellant on January 1, 1927, by reletting the premises without notice to the appellant that he intended to relet for the benefit and account of the appellant. He further contends that the evidence is insufficient to support finding IV in which the court found that the reletting was after notice, and for the benefit and account of defendant.

The only testimony in regard to the matter is found in the testimony of respondent, Treff, and is as follows:

"Q. Now at the time you rented this store at $75.00, when did that begin? A. January 1, 1927.

"Q. And at what time, did you have any conversation with Jacob Gulko in reference to renting the store to someone else? A. I went to Mr. Gulko before that.

"Mr. Camarillo: What Gulko?

"A. To J. Gulko, and asked him to try to rent that store if he could and I would do the —somebody that I liked to rent it, and I would do the best I could to rent it. But he tried to tell me that he didn't have anything to do with it; so I done the best I could to rent the store.

"Q. (By Mr. Mason.) What did he tell you at that time? A. He says that he didn't have anything to do with it.

"Q. What did you tell him? A. Well I didn't tell him anything, I just went my way, there was no use to argue with him."

Under date of December 9, 1927, almost a year after the reletting of the storeroom, respondent's attorney addressed a "memorandum of rent due" from appellant, to respondent, and concluded the memorandum with the following statement: "The premises involved are now under lease at the best price obtainable, to-wit, $75.00 per month for the first 18 months of the term, and $100.00 per month for the next 18 months of the term, said term commencing January 1, 1927. In computing the rents due from Mr. Gulko, credit has been given for the rents payable under the present lease as shown above." Aside from the testimony already quoted the record is silent as to what the respective parties did in regard to exercising any control over the premises after their abandonment by appellant.

The lease contained no provisions in regard to reletting. It provided, in substance, that, should default be made in the payment of any portion of the rent, when due, and for thirty days thereafter, or in any of the covenants contained in the lease, the lessor, his agent, or attorney might re-enter and take possession of the premises, remove all persons therefrom, and at his option terminate the lease.

[1] The rule is well settled that upon the surrender of leased premises by a lessee before the expiration of the term provided for by the lease, the owner of the premises has three remedies: First, he may do nothing and sue the lessee as each installment of rent becomes due, or for the whole thereof when it becomes due; second, he may treat the lease as terminated and retake possession of the premises and use the same for his own purposes as the exclusive owner thereof; or, third, he may retake possession of the premises for the tenant's account and hold the tenant in damages for the difference between the rentals provided for in the lease and what in good faith he was able to procure from a reletting. Siller v. Dunn, 103 Cal. App. 154, 284 P. 232.

In the case of Phillips-Hollman, Inc., v. Peerless Stages, Inc. (Cal. Sup.) 291 P. 178, the court said at page 180:

"The rule is well settled that where a lease has been repudiated by a tenant, and the premises abandoned, and there are no covenants in the lease to the contrary, the landlord has a choice of but two remedies:

"1. He may rest upon his contract and sue for each installment of rent as it falls due. If this alternative be selected, obviously the action must be limited to accrued installments, and no recovery can be had for future installments, because, the lease being still in existence, no obligation to pay the rent arises until each installment falls due.

"2. He may take possession of the premises, relet the same, and recover from the tenant any damages suffered thereby. Such damages will be the difference between the amount secured on the reletting and the amount provided for in the original lease. If this alternative be selected, in the absence of a covenant in the lease to the contrary, and perhaps where the landlord has relet for the balance of the entire term (which latter point we do not here decide), the law is well settled that the landlord cannot recover in installments, but must bring his action at the expiration of the original term, at which time the damages for the first time can be ascertained. Oliver v. Loydon, 163 Cal. 124, 124 P. 731; Bradbury v. Higginson, 162 Cal. 602, 123 P. 797; Hermitage Co. v. Levine, 248 N. Y. 333, 162 N. E. 97, 98, 59 A. L. R. 1015. See, also Respini v. Porta, 89 Cal. 464, 26 P. 967, 23 Am. St. Rep. 488."

[2] In the present case, the respondent having elected to take possession of the premises and relet the same and to rest upon his action for damages, we must conclude, upon the authority of the last-quoted case, that his action was prematurely begun, and that the judgment awarding damages to him must be reversed.

[3] There is a further and more serious reason why the judgment of the trial court cannot be sustained. The only allegations appearing in the complaint in regard to the assignment of the lease and the assumption of its obligations by appellant are found in paragraph II and are as follows: "That thereafter and during said term, to-wit, on the 2nd day of February, 1925, the said Peretz and Addleson in writing assigned and transferred unto the said defendant all their right and interest in and to said lease and premises, and thereupon their rights therein and thereto became, and ever since have been, vested in the defendant, and the defendant thereupon entered into possession and remained in possession of said premises under said lease so assigned to him."

The court found, in substance, that it was true that, after the making and delivery of said lease by the respondent to the original lessees on February 2, 1925, said lessees in writing assigned and transferred to appellant all their right and interest in and to said lease and leased premises and the said lease thereon, and that thereupon their rights therein became, and ever since have been, vested in the appellant, and that the appellant thereupon entered into possession and remained in possession of said premises under said lease so assigned to him and occupied said premises and "promised to pay said rent." The finding that appellant promised to pay the rent is not sustained by the evidence, the only basis for such a finding being appellant's occupancy of the premises and his payment of the rent during the period between February 2, 1925, and the month of February, 1926. The appellant did not sign the original lease or any acceptance of such lease and entered into no new agreement to assume the obligations of the lease or to pay the rent.

[4, 5] In the absence of fresh contractual stipulations, there is no privity of contract between the assignee of the lessee and the landlord (Farber v. Greenberg, 98 Cal. App. 675, 277 P. 534), and when a tenant holds under a mere naked assignment of a lease, his liability is, as to the landlord, limited to his occupancy of the premises and terminates with his abandonment of possession. Chase v. Oehlke, 43 Cal. App. 435, 185 P. 425. The subject is carefully discussed in 15 California Jurisprudence at page 753, where it is said: "Privity of contract between landlord and lessee, however, is not affected by the latter's assignment, but continues until the end of the term notwithstanding he is no longer in possession of the premises. In the absence of fresh contractual stipulation, there is no privity of contract between the assignee and the landlord. But the assignee may, by express stipulation to be bound by the covenants of the lease, create a privity of contract between himself and the landlord, which will also enure till the term expires. By virtue of such an agreement the assignee becomes liable upon and entitled to the benefit of all the covenants of the lease as such. It seems, however, that to establish privity of contract between landlord and assignee, the necessary agreement must be made between them themselves." See, also, Bush v. Bastian et al., 297 P. 976, decided March 17, 1931, in this court, wherein it was held that, under the allegations of a complaint in which it was alleged in substance that a lessee assigned a certain lease to the appellant with the express stipulation that the lessee would continue to be bound by all of the terms of the lease, and that pursuant to such assignment the appellant went into possession and occupation of certain premises, the liability of the appellant assignee to the lessor was limited to the rentals accruing prior to the assignee's abandonment of the possession of the leased premises.

In view of the conclusions which we have announced, we consider it unnecessary to discuss the various questions treated in the briefs of appellant and of the respondent.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Defendants have appealed on the judgment roll from a judgment against them in plaintiff's favor. The complaint alleges that the action is brought on a promissory note in the sum of $2,250, executed by the defendants in favor of plaintiff, no part of which has been paid. The answer admits such allegations, and sets up as a defense that plaintiff was a surety on a supersedeas bond given to stay execution of the sentence of two years' imprisonment and $5,000 fine imposed upon one Rush Meadows after conviction in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California and pending review of said judgment by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, 11 F.(2d) 718; that after said judgment was affirmed said Meadows applied to the trial court for an additional stay of execution of thirty days, which the court refused to grant except upon immediate payment of the $5,000 fine; that defendants contributed $1,400, and various other sums were contributed by other friends and relatives, including the plaintiff, Cla Vell; that after said sum of $5,000 had been raised and the fine paid, plaintiff demanded that she be secured for her contribution, and that defendants, in order to appease the ravings of said Cla Vell, executed the promissory note, which is the subject of this action, to repay to plaintiff the amount she had theretofore paid on her own obligation.

With regard to said defense the court found that Meadows was found guilty and sentence imposed as alleged; that plaintiff was related by marriage to Meadows, and that on July 30, 1925, the latter, as principal, and Mrs. Cla Vell, with two other sureties, "executed a supersedeas bond in said proceeding in favor of the United States of America in the penal sum of $25,000," with the following condition: "* * * That if the said Rush Meadows shall appear in person in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit on such day or days as may be appointed for the hearing of said cause in said court, and prosecute his writ of error, and shall abide by and obey all orders made by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in said cause, and shall pay any fine and costs imposed by the judgment of the District Court against him, and shall surrender himself in execution of the judgment and sentence appealed from as said court may direct, if the judgment and sentence against him shall be affirmed or the writ of error or appeal is dismissed, and if he shall appear for trial in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, Southern Division, on such day or days as may be appointed for a retrial by said District Court and abide by and obey all orders of said court, provided the judgment and sentence against him shall be reversed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, then the above obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect." The court further found that said Meadows perfected his appeal, and that on November 3, 1926, said United States Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment of the trial court theretofore rendered against him; "that at and prior to the time that said conviction * * * was affirmed said defendants and the said Rush Meadows were interested in obtaining the rights to certain mica claims in the state of New Mexico, and that at the time that said conviction of said Rush Meadows was affirmed the said Rush Meadows was assisting the said defendants in obtaining an interest in said mica claims; that upon said conviction being affirmed as aforesaid, it was necessary that the said Rush Meadows produce himself at once and be delivered into custody, and it was the desire of the defendants, and each of them, that said Rush Meadows be granted a stay of execution for a period of thirty days or more to enable him to consummate a transfer of an interest in said mica claims to the said defendants, and to enable him to obtain the assistance of one Walter A. Jones and his mother and one Mrs. Derenia in defendant's business;" that before said stay would be granted by said court it "was ordered and required by the Honorable Edward J. Henning, judge of said court, that as a condition to the granting of said stay of execution the said Rush Meadows pay his said fine at once and forthwith, namely, on or before the 8th day of November, 1926." The findings further state that defendants and each of them were interested in obtaining said stay in order that Meadows could complete the transaction of said business in New Mexico, and that they attempted to raise the money to pay said fine, but succeeded only in raising $1,400 thereof; that defendants each agreed with plaintiff "that if she would advance the sum of $3,600 towards the payment of said fine that they, the said defendants, in consideration of her advancing the said sum of $3,600, and as security to her," would execute the promissory note sued on; that said fine was paid on the 8th day of November, 1926, said stay of execution granted and the note in question executed and delivered. The court further found that the plaintiff, Cla Vell, was not of unsound mind at the time, and that said note was not executed to appease her ravings, and as a conclusion of law therefrom that "said promissory note was executed and delivered to plaintiff by defendants for a valuable consideration."

It is appellants' contention that the conclusion of law above referred to is contrary to and not supported by the findings, for the reason (1) that the supersedeas bond posted on appeal from a judgment in the United States District Court in a criminal case operates as a stay of execution and obligates the sureties to pay the fine imposed upon an affirmance of the judgment, and (2) that neither the performance of nor the promise to perform that which one is already obligated to a third party to do is a sufficient consideration for a promise. We agree with the second contention, and the first is substantially correct, although it might be more proper to say that the supersedeas effects the stay, the bond being simply a necessary step to make it effective; but it seems to us that the principle contended for is not applicable to the facts of this case.

[1-3] The authority of the court to require such a bond as was given in the instant case is not questioned, and any doubt that might exist seems to be settled by the authorities. Williams v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 1 F.(2d) 203, 204; Rule 13, U. S. C. C. A., 150 F., p. xxviii; Rule 75, U. S. Dist. Ct. Sou. Dist. of California. But the bond used in effecting a supersedeas "does not involve the question whether the defendant shall be permitted to go at large pending the writ of error, an appearance or bail bond being required to permit such result." Hardesty v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 184 F. 269, 272. So we must conclude, there being no evidence before us, that the defendant in the criminal case here involved was in custody at the time the sentence was imposed; and it would appear that the bond given is not only a supersedeas but an appearance bond as well, and so it reads, for it not only requires the defendant Meadows to prosecute his appeal and pay any fine and costs imposed, but also that he "shall surrender himself in execution of the judgment and sentence appealed from" as the trial court "may direct, if the judgment and sentence against him shall be affirmed." We must assume, therefore, in an appeal of this kind, and in the absence of evidence, that the trial court ordered Meadows to appear for sentence—and that seems to be a proper inference from the finding—and that upon Meadows' request for a stay of execution he was ordered to pay the fine as a condition to granting the same, and that plaintiff, at the request of defendants, agreed, not only to furnish the money required to make up the necessary amount, in consideration of the execution of the note in question, but as well consented to continue her liability for thirty days on the bond for the appearance of the defendant even after the affirmance of the judgment against him, in order to permit him to go to New Mexico on business in which the defendants were interested and she was not. This was a considerable additional risk and a sufficient detriment to the promisee to support the note—the contract. It is also a fair inference from the findings that plaintiff did not pay the fine, but that in addition to consenting that her bond remain in force for ninety days, in consideration of the defendants executing the note, she advanced the defendants the money necessary, with the $1,400 which they already had, to make up the $5,000 needed, and that the latter either paid the fine themselves or gave the money to Meadows with which to pay it, he having the primary obligation under the bond so to do.

We see no error in the conclusions of law reached by the trial court.

the hearing of the oral argument, and therefore that the opinion should, in the absence of a stipulation covering the matter, have been written by one of the justices present at such oral presentation. In answer to this it is only necessary to remind counsel that, immediately preceding the calling of the calendar upon the date of oral argument herein, the court announced that, unless objection were made at the time of argument, it would be deemed stipulated in all matters then before the court that any justice pro tempore might participate in the decision of any or all matters then on the calendar, and that no objection was made by any counsel appearing in the present case.

In the fourth paragraph of the opinion, as reported in 297 P. 980, at page 982, the sentence commencing, "We must assume, therefore, in an appeal of this kind, and in the absence of evidence, that the trial court ordered Meadows to appear for sentence" is changed to read: "We must assume, therefore, in an appeal of this kind, and in the absence of evidence, that the trial court ordered Meadows to appear for execution of the judgment and sentence," etc.

JACKSON v. THE GABLES et al.

Civ. 7729.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 30, 1931.

1. Clubs 🔑11.

Plaintiff held not entitled to damages on theory of breach of contract in excluding him from club (Civ. Code, §§ 3300, 3301).

> There was no specific finding, nor any finding from which inference might be drawn that plaintiff ever became member of club, or that corporation conducting club owed him any service whatsoever.

2. Clubs 🔑11.

No responsibility could rest on corporation conducting club under findings showing directors and employees acting entirely without their functions and individually deceived plaintiff into believing he was member.

3. Clubs 🔑12.

Loss of wife's company and services was not proper element of damage for club's failure to accord plaintiff privileges.

> That wife would leave plaintiff because of humiliation and ridicule could not be anticipated damage that would arise from breach of contract to accord plaintiff privileges of club, nor could it be damage flowing from alleged injury on theory that defendant's act was tort.

4. Clubs 🔑11.

Corporation conducting club, and its directors, could not be held liable for acts of clubhouse manager ordering plaintiff from clubhouse.

> It was found that the clubhouse manager took orders from each of the directors in their individual capacity and knowingly and willfully enforced them under the guise of his authority as manager.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1073(7).

Judgment for damages could not stand, where findings did not disclose amount imputed to each injury, and one element of damages should not have been allowed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles F. Cook, Judge.

Action by Louis H. Jackson against The Gables and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant and others appeal.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by certain defendants from a judgment rendered against them in an action, the nature of which will hereinafter appear. The appeal comes before us on the judgment roll alone. The nature of the case will appear from the findings of fact, and, these said findings controlling, as they must, the judgment will be determinative of the appeal. The Gables is a corporation regularly organized and existing, with its principal place of business at Los Angeles. More than 75 per cent. of the capital stock of said corporation is owned by the defendants Cohen, Saunders, and Crawford. These defendants were the directors of the corporation at all times covered by the pleadings, the two first named being president and secretary, respectively. It seems that this corporation owned and controlled and operated what was by it designated as a club, though not in the sense that the term is generally used. The name of the club was "The Gables." This club was not a social organization, the affairs of which were directed, in any sense, by the members, but was more in the nature of an invitational hotel or rendezvous for those who might comply with the terms of the corporation. Speaking more or less loosely, but descriptive to some degree of accuracy, the idea was to operate an institution for the exclusive use of selected patrons to the end that the conceit of a private club might be indulged. The corporation did not issue stock to its members, but did issue to them a license to use the property and facilities of the club upon payment of certain stipulated membership fees in accord with the rules and regulations of the club, and the club was managed and operated under the direction and control solely of the board of directors in the manner in which said board might determine. The corporation was at all times the owner of the clubhouse at Santa Monica and was in possession and active operation of the said club. The actual operation of the club was carried on by the board of directors, employees, agents, and servants of The Gables, the said employees being partially under the direction and control of the board of directors and partially under the personal direction of Cohen, Saunders, and Crawford and one Tyler, the latter being the manager of the club. About March, 1926, the plaintiff was solicited to become a member and thereafter made application for life membership in the club. He made the payments required, part in cash and part by note, aggregating the sum of $500. Incidentally, the note was subsequently paid. He was given a card indicating life membership, was given keys, and his name was printed in the roster of membership, and he was urged to solicit new members. The specific finding of the court is as follows, with respect to plaintiff's application: "The court finds that plaintiff complied with all of the by-laws but that the defendants Cohen, Saunders and Crawford did not function in accordance with the by-laws of The Gables governing the board of directors, of which they composed the membership of said board, but were lax, negligent and careless in their duties in such capacity and exercised authority as individuals under the guise of being directors of said club." In any event, in addition to the giving of the keys and the publication of the name in the roster, plaintiff held himself out to members of his family and to friends and business associates as a life member of the club and entertained members of his family and friends and business associates at the clubhouse with the knowledge and consent of the officers of The Gables, to whom the management of the club was intrusted by the board of directors, which board of directors were the owners of more than 75 per cent. of the capital stock of the corporation. The court finds as follows: "That some of these things were done by officers and employees of The Gables, with the knowledge and consent of the officers and members of the board of directors of The Gables and some were done by said directors and manager, as individuals, knowingly and intentionally." The application for membership, hereinbefore referred to, was not formally acted upon by the directors by reason of the individual negligence and carelessness of Cohen, Saunders, and Crawford, but at a special meeting of the board of directors, supposedly to be held on June 30, 1926, Cohen, Saunders, and Crawford did knowingly, willfully, and intentionally, and under the guise of the board of directors of The Gables, attempt to pass a valid resolution rejecting the application of the plaintiff for life membership. The directors thereafter notified plaintiff of his rejection and made various offers of restoration, none of which, it may be conceded, conformed to the requirements of a tender. Again, quoting verbatim the findings: "That by its actions The Gables accepted the application of plaintiff for life membership and entered into a contractual obligation with plaintiff to give plaintiff all of the rights and privileges accorded to other life members under the rules and regulations." On July 30, 1926, the plaintiff went to the clubhouse with a prospective purchaser of certain property owned by plaintiff, the purpose of the visit, as the court finds, being to consummate a transaction for the sale of the said property. Here again we take the findings verbatim: That on said occasion plaintiff was notified by the defendant Morgan S. Tyler and other defendants in a boisterous and ungentlemanly way, that The Gables refused to accord plaintiff the privileges of the club, and refused to accord him the privileges to which he, as a life member, was entitled under the rules and regulations, and that he (the said Morgan S. Tyler) individually ordered plaintiff from the clubhouse in a loud and vulgar tone of voice within the hearing of other persons in the clubhouse, and plaintiff was insulted, humiliated, and ridiculed in the presence of his guest, and that the plaintiff suffered damage thereby, on said occasion on July 30, 1926. The court then specifically finds that plaintiff was not damaged by reason of the loss of the contemplated sale, and finds also that it is not true that plaintiff has lost business or suffered in his income, or been damaged by the injury to his business by reason of the refusal of The Gables to accord him the privileges of the club or by reason of any act of The Gables or any of the defendants. The court, however, does find as follows: That it is true that plaintiff and plaintiff's wife suffered humiliation and damage by reason of cancellation of invitation to guests to dine at and visit The Gables Club. That it is true that plaintiff's wife left the home of plaintiff to avoid the publicity, ridicule, and humiliation of facing friends and the public by reason of the failure of The Gables to accord plaintiff the privileges of life membership in The Gables Club, and by reason of the actions of The Gables and of the other defendants, and that plaintiff's wife remained away from plaintiff's home and would not associate with plaintiff by reason of the refusal of defendants, and each of them, to accord plaintiff the rights and privileges of life membership in The Gables Club, and by reason of the actions of The Gables and of the other defendants plaintiff was deprived of the right of his wife's company and her services by reason of said act and/or acts of The Gables and the other defendants. Then follows the general finding that plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $1,500 and is entitled to 7 per cent. per annum interest on $500 thereof from July 30, 1926, until judgment is entered. The foregoing passages are taken directly from the findings of the trial court, and, while some portions reflect specific findings in verbatim, the remainder is an accurate synopsis of the findings as the same appear before us. From these findings the court drew its conclusions of law. These are few in number and comparatively brief. The court concluded that the action of The Gables constituted an acceptance of an application of plaintiff for life membership in the club operated by The Gables; and The Gables thereby entered into a contract with plaintiff to accord him the rights and privileges of a life member. It also drew the conclusion: "That The Gables is a corporation of which more than seventy-five per cent of the capital stock was owned individually by Cohen, who acted as one of the board of directors of said Gables Club, through whose instrumentality said board of directors conducted the affairs of the club under the name and guise of club memberships in The Gables, for their own private gain and purpose and were the beneficiaries from the funds paid in for membership fees by the plaintiff for the privileges afforded under the rules and regulations of said club, and said board of directors were lax, negligent and careless in not conducting the affairs of said club in accordance with the by-laws, rules and regulations of said club. That the notice of the rejection of plaintiff's application and refusal to accord plaintiff the rights and privileges of a life member, constituted a breach of the contract and amounted to a cancellation of the membership without compliance with the provisions of the rules and regulations on the subject of cancellation of memberships. That plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendants, The Gables, a corporation, J. Ward Cohen, Edward Charles Saunders, James Crawford and Morgan S. Tyler, and each of them, in the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars, with interest at 7% per annum from July 30, 1926, until the entry of judgment on the sum of $500, as a part of said judgment." Judgment was entered accordingly, and it is from the judgment so entered that defendants prosecute the appeal.

[1, 2] We have gone into the foregoing detail, urged by the very necessity of the case, in order to demonstrate the complete unintelligibility of the findings of fact and conclusions of law upon which rest the judgment. It cannot be determined upon what theory, either of law or fact, the judgment followed. The underlying basis of the judgment, as indicated both in the findings and in the conclusions of law predicated thereon, seems to be that a certain contract between plaintiff and the corporation was violated. This breach of contract consisted in the refusal of the corporation to render to plaintiff the privileges due him as a member of a so-called club operated by it. From this viewpoint, plaintiff was entitled to recover only such an amount, as damages, as would compensate him for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom. Civ. Code, § 3300. No damages can be recovered for a breach of contract which are not clearly ascertainable in both their nature and origin. Civ. Code, § 3301. And the facts here found do not indicate damages of that nature. Notwithstanding all of the actions of the defendants who constitute the board of directors of the corporation, however they may be characterized in the findings with respect to the admission of the plaintiff into the club, no damage could have resulted to plaintiff thereby. The alleged and found purpose of the activities of these individuals was to refuse admission to the plaintiff, which purpose was not accomplished in that the court finds that the plaintiff was admitted to membership and accorded the usual privileges of the club. The apparent holding of the trial court was that plaintiff became a member of the club, not by reason of express action on the part of the directorate, but through failure of the said controlling authority to function. And this is apparent from the finding that no formal action was ever taken upon plaintiff's application by the board of directors by reason of the individual negligence of the members of said board. But the court then finds that these same directors did knowingly, willfully, and intentionally, under the guise of the board of directors, attempt to pass a valid resolution rejecting plaintiff's application for membership. Likewise the trial court, throughout its findings, stresses the fact that these directors did not function in accordance with the by-laws, but were lax, negligent, and careless in their duties in such capacity, and exercised authority as individuals under the guise of being directors. The court therefore bases its finding on the existence of a contract on the actions of the parties. It found that a membership card was issued to plaintiff, a key given him, and account opened. That his name was published in a roster of members, and that he was solicited to bring in others of the elect who might be found worthy. Yet the court finds the fact to be that some of these things were done by officers and employees, with the knowledge and consent of the officers and the members of the board of directors, and some were done by said directors and manager, as individuals, knowingly and intentionally. So it seems apparent from the foregoing that there is no specific finding, nor any finding from which such inference may be drawn, that plaintiff ever did become a member of the so-called club or that the corporation owed him any service whatsoever. And it must follow that any rights plaintiff had or could claim to have on the premises described as the clubhouse were by virtue of his election to membership. If, as is found, the directors and employees of the clubhouse, acting entirely without their functions, and individually, deceived the plaintiff into believing that he was a member of the club, in violation of the corporation's by-laws and regulations, it seems too plain for citation that no responsibility under these findings would rest upon the corporation. Respondent urges that the contract is merely by way of inducement, and that the action is in fact and effect an action in tort. This would hardly be true as against the corporation whose initial liability must rest upon the alleged contract.

[3, 4] However, we may consider the action as one in tort. Assuming that plaintiff was a life member of the club, the only overt act alleged or found by the court was that on July 30th when plaintiff presented himself at the clubhouse the defendant Tyler, neither an officer nor director in the corporation, and other defendants not designated nor described, in a boisterous and ungentlemanly manner notified plaintiff that The Gables refused to accord plaintiff the privileges of the club and refused to accord him the privileges to which he as a life member was entitled. There is no finding as to what those privileges were or were claimed to be, and nothing to indicate what acts or words would support the conclusion, to-wit, "in a boisterous and ungentlemanly manner." And further embraced in this one occasion of July 30th is the finding that Morgan S. Tyler, individually, ordered plaintiff from the clubhouse in a loud and vulgar tone of voice and plaintiff was insulted, ridiculed, and humiliated in the presence of his guest. And here it is interesting to identify the said Tyler. He is found to be the manager of the clubhouse operated by The Gables and took orders from each of the directors in their individual capacity and knowingly and willfully enforced the same under the guise of his authority as manager. Such a finding means absolutely nothing. The further finding in relation to the alleged tort is that, some weeks before the alleged wrong, the directors, acting "under the guise of their directorship," notified plaintiff that he was not a member, and with this notification an attempt was made to return to him the moneys paid, which plaintiff refused. The findings as to damage are equally confusing. The court found that plaintiff was humiliated and also that he suffered damage thereby; also that his wife was humiliated, and that, because the family friends ridiculed plaintiff on account of this club refusing him service, the wife left plaintiff and refused to further abide with or serve him; also that plaintiff's wife refused to return to plaintiff's home and would not associate with him by refusal of the defendants, and each of them, to accord the plaintiff the rights and privileges to which he was entitled by reason of his membership. Surely this could not be an anticipated damage that could arise from a mere breach of the contract, nor could it be a damage flowing from the alleged injury. If the exclusion of plaintiff from this club brought upon him the ridicule of his friends, it would, in the ordinary course of events, be presumed that the marital bond would be tightened and that the wife's obligation to cleave only unto him for better or for worse would reach its highest fulfillment. A claim of this sort on account of the acts found can find no support in law or reason, and with the nondescript relationship of Tyler to the corporation or to the other defendants, even if the former could be held liable for these damages, the latter could not.

[5] Summing up, it appears that the court found that the moneys received by the directors were paid to and retained by the corporation, totaling $500, regardless of the contract. It is not claimed that the directors are liable for the return thereof, but the defendant corporation called The Gables as one of the appellants concedes its liability for the return of this money. The findings as to damages are not segregated so as to disclose the amount of damage imputed to each alleged injury. It is impossible to determine from the findings what amount of damage is allowed by reason of the loss of the wife's companionship and service, or for either, and what amount allowed as compensation for the indignity, suffered with the accompanying humiliation and ridicule of the friends of plaintiff. A somewhat similar situation will be found in the case of Hullinger v. Big Sespe Oil Co., 28 Cal. App. 69, 151 P. 369, wherein it was held that the findings as to the different elements of damage were too uncertain and indefinite to support the judgment, and it was the conclusion of the reviewing court that for such reason alone the judgment could not stand. This is particularly true here for the reason that the damages found to have accrued to plaintiff on account of the loss of wife's consortium and service was, in no event, a proper element of damage. It is not for us to determine what might have been in the mind of the trial court, and, having thus determined, adjust the items in accord therewith; much less would it be the function of this court to attempt an independent segregation. We have gone rather exhaustively into the record before us, not because we felt that plaintiff has presented or has made a case worthy of profound consideration, but solely because we are mindful of the rule and policy which leans toward the upholding of a trial court's findings and judgment whenever the record will permit. We have searched in vain for any substantial ground of reasoning from which we might declare the judgment before us to have even the semblance of a basis that might sustain it. There are no compelling features demanding that plaintiff have relief; nor are there any clear facts indicating his great injury. It might be barely possible, from the claims of plaintiff, that he might have better contended that his ancestral line had become attainted by reason of the fact that this camouflaged arbiter of the elegance of the locality had taken from him the nobility which membership in this ultra select commercial organization might have implied. The findings amply disclose that plaintiff was notified by those found to be in full charge of the club and its affairs that his membership had been canceled and efforts were being made to refund plaintiff the money he had paid. In the face of this and with an advance knowledge that those in charge disputed his right, the plaintiff took with him a witness and went to the club premises, obviously for the purpose of establishing a basis for just such an action as this. It is clear that he deliberately sought to build up a cause of action, and, while it is possible that a cause of action may be constructed in this way, yet, when the artifice appears, it must be of such skillfulness to withstand scrutiny and attack. It might be noted, however, that an apparent injustice results from reversing the judgment in toto. Sufficient appears from the findings to indicate that the defendant The Gables, a corporation, has received and now retains the sum of $500, paid by plaintiff as a membership fee. This membership has been denied plaintiff. Defendant corporation concedes its liability to plaintiff in that amount. Therefore it is the conclusion of this court that the judgment be reversed as to all of the defendants, save and except defendant The Gables, a corporation. That as to this defendant corporation the judgment be modified and reduced to the sum of $500, with interest from July 30, 1926; appellants and each of them, including the corporation, to recover costs on this appeal.
